Congressional Record.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

MONDAY, December 5, 1921.

The first Monday in December being the day prescribed by the Constitution of the United States for the annual meeting of Congress, the second session of the Sixty-seventh Congress commenced this day.

The Senate assembled in its Chamber at the Capitol.

The VICE PRESIDENT (CALVIN COOLIDGE, of Massachusetts) called the Senate to order at 12 o'clock noon.

PRAYER.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our gracious Father, we bless Thee for the care Thou hast had over us, for all the mercies realized and for the good promised. We humbly beseech Thee this morning, as the duties of a regular session are pressing, that great wisdom and large understanding of the problems may be had, and by the guidance of Thine own overruling direction that the best results for the country and the world shall be realized. We humbly ask, in the name of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

CALL OF THE ROLL.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I make the point of no quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll, that it may be ascertained that a constitutional number of Senators are present for the transaction of business.

The reading clerk (John C. Crockett) called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fernald	Lenroot	Sheppard
Ball	Fletcher	Lodge	Shortridge
Borah	France	McCumber	Simmons

NOTIFICATION TO THE HOUSE.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 179), which was read by the Assistant Secretary (Henry M. Rose), considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled, and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 180), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of two Senators be appointed, to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House is assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed as the committee Mr. LODGE and Mr. HITCHCOCK.

HOUR OF DAILY MEETING.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 181), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the hour of daily meeting of the Senate be 12 o'clock meridian until otherwise ordered.

ADJUSTMENT OF FOREIGN LOANS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. I desire to state that after to-morrow and the message of the President has been heard I shall hope to succeed in having the bill relating to the so-called funding of the foreign debt made the unfinished business of the Senate. The Committee on Finance will meet to-morrow morning and consider House bill 8762 upon that subject, which is before the committee, having passed the House; and it will be reported to-morrow to the Senate and offered at the proper time in connection with Senate bill 2135, already on the calendar.

RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. In order to give an opportunity for the committee of the two Houses to notify the President that Congress has assembled and is ready to receive a communication from him, I move that the Senate take a recess until 3 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until 3 o'clock p. m., at which hour it reassembled.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. LODGE and Mr. HITCHCOCK appeared, and

Mr. LODGE said:

Mr. President, the committee appointed by the Senate have the honor to report that in conjunction with the committee appointed by the House they have seen the President of the United States and that in reply to their announcement that the Congress is organized and ready for business, he informed them that he will communicate with the Congress to-morrow, that he will come to the House of Representatives at half past 12 and there deliver his message.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

Mr. Overhue, the enrolling clerk of the House of Representatives, appeared and delivered the following message:

Mr. President, I am directed by the House of Representatives to inform the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives has assembled and that the House is ready for business.

Also, that a committee of three were appointed by the Speaker on the part of the House of Representatives to join with the committee on the part of the Senate to wait on the President of the United States and to notify him that a quorum of the two Houses has assembled and that Congress is ready to receive any communication that he may be pleased to make, and that Mr. MONDELL, Mr. MADDEN, and Mr. GARRETT of Tennesssee were appointed as the committee on the part of the House.

Further, that the House has agreed to a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 32) authorizing the two Houses of Congress to assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Tuesday, the 6th day of December, 1921, at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes in the afternoon for the purpose of receiving such communication as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate.

[Several messages in writing from the President of the United States were transmitted to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.]

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives (H. Con. Res. 32), which was read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Tuesday, the 6th day of December, 1921, at 12.30 o'clock in the afternoon, for the purpose of receiving such communications as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate concur in the resolution which has just been read.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

THE BUDGET.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

MESSAGE.

To the Congress of the United States:

I submit herewith the budget of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923. It will be noted that the estimated ordinary expenditures for 1922 show a reduction of $1,513,537,682.20, compared with the actual ordinary expenditures for 1921; and that the estimated ordinary expenditures for 1923 show a reduction of $447,704,239 under 1922, making the estimated ordinary expenditures under the budget for 1923 $1,961,241,921.20 less than the actual ordinary expenditures for 1921. Including transactions in the principal of the public debt and investments of trust funds, the total estimated expenditures for 1922 show a reduction under the total actual expenditures for 1921 of $1,570,118,323.30 and the total estimated expenditures for 1923 show a reduction of $462,167,639 under the total estimated expenditures for 1922, making a reduction in total expenditures in the estimated budget for 1923, as compared with the total actual expenditures for 1921, of $2,032,285,962.30. It will also be noted that the total estimated receipts for 1922 are in approximate balance with the total estimated expenditures, including reduction in the principal of the public debt, and that the total estimated receipts for 1923 are within approximately $150,000,000 of a balance with the total estimated expenditures of that year. Such a discrepancy is unavoidable, when authorizations of expenditure are being enacted during the process of budget closing, but ways are provided for relatively easy adjustment, without added taxation.

For the purpose of providing a portion of the funds necessary to balance the budget for 1923, in which the estimated expenditures exceed the estimated receipts by the sum of approximately $150,000,000, I recommend the following legislation in connection with the naval appropriation bill for 1923, which would result in the eventual automatic release of $100,000,000 now held in the naval supply account of the Navy Department:

"Hereafter, until the naval supply account shall have been reduced to a maximum sum of $150,000,000, which shall not thereafter be exceeded, one-half of all reimbursements otherwise due to the naval supply account, whether from current issues or from sales, shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts, and only one-half shall be credited to the naval supply account."

With continued pressure for economy in all departments and the passage of such legislation, the balancing of total receipts and total expenditures for the fiscal years 1922 and 1923 should be accomplished.

I also transmit herewith the report of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget on the budget of the United States and the operations of the Bureau of the Budget.

The details of the budget are shown in the accompanying statements, and may be briefly summarized as follows:

BUDGET SUMMARY.

Exclusive of postal revenues and postal expenditures paid from postal revenues.

Total receipts	$3,338,182,750	$3,943,453,663	$5,624,932,960.91
Total expenditures, including reduction in principal of public debt	3,505,754,727	3,967,922,366	5,538,040,689.30
Excess of expenditures	167,571,977	24,468,703
Excess of receipts			86,892,271.61

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 5, 1921.

THE ALTERNATIVE BUDGET.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

To the Congress of the United States:

I submit herewith the alternative budget for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, as required by section 205 of the budget and accounting act, 1921.

The information regarding revenues and expenditures is the same as that contained in the budget, with such changes in arrangement as will better present the facts in connection with the spending departments.

The estimates of appropriations in the alternative budget have been so assembled and correlated that all estimates for any given department are included in one chapter.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 5, 1921.

STATUTES RELATIVE TO RECEIPTS, EXPENDITURES, AND ESTIMATES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a codification of the Federal statutes relating to the preparation and transmission to Congress of statements of receipts and expenditures of the Government and of estimates of appropriations, in accordance with the provisions of section 210 of the budget and accounting act, 1920.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 5, 1921.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, December 6, 1921, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 5, 1921.

This being the day designated by the Constitution of the United States for the annual meeting of Congress, the Members of the House of Representatives assembled in their Hall for the second session of the Sixty-seventh Congress, and at 12 o'clock noon were called to order by the Speaker, Hon. FREDERICK H. GILLETT.

PRAYER.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, holy, holy, holy is Thy name; and may we only speak it in prayer and utter it in praise. We are so thankful that the heavens do stoop to our need. Therefore let gratitude, the joy of living, and the passion of a new life be declared in us. Make these days memorable in our Nation's history. Encourage every pure thought, give strength to every good aspiration, and make vital every duty which gives beauty to home, stability to society, and permanence to our Government. O, hold Thou our hands and be our guardian and the center of all our labors. Enable us to stand and falter not, to hope and fear not, to trust and never be dismayed. O come to the nations so weighted with depression and so bowed down with sorrow, and may universal peace lie like a shaft of light across the lands of the world. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and twenty-one Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Senate resolution 179.

Resolved, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled, and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business.

Senate resolution 180.

Resolved, That a committee consisting of two Senators be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House is assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

The message also announced that in compliance with the foregoing resolution the Vice President appointed as said committee Mr. LODGE and Mr. HITCHCOCK.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2710. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Pamunkey Ferry Co. to construct a bridge across the Pamunkey River in Virginia.

NOTIFICATION OF THE SENATE.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask immediate consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

House resolution 236.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House inform the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives has appeared and that the House is ready to proceed with business.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

NOTIFICATION OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I also offer the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

House resolution 237.

Resolved, That a committee of three Members be appointed by the Speaker on the part of the House of Representatives to join with the committee on the part of the Senate to notify the President of the United States that a quorum of each House has assembled and that Congress is ready to receive any communication that he may be pleased to make.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to, and the Speaker appointed as the committee on the part of the House Mr. MONDELL, Mr. MADDEN, and Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee.

HOUR OF DAILY MEETING.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

House resolution 238.

Resolved, That until otherwise ordered the hour of daily meeting of the House of Representatives shall be 12 o'clock meridian.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

GENERAL DEBATE.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there be three hours of debate, to be divided equally between the two sides of the House; that I control an hour and a half and that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] control an hour and a half.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. On what subject?

Mr. MONDELL. On the state of the Union. Some gentlemen desire to speak on the St. Lawrence River Canal.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] spoke to me about the matter a few moments ago. I understood that he wanted two hours to be controlled on that side and an hour on this side, which was to be evened up to-morrow. I agreed to that, because I do not know that we will have any occasion to ask for more than one hour to-day.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If that is agreeable to the gentleman from Tennessee, I will modify my request.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is agreeable to this side, it being understood that it will be equalized later.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that there be general debate for three hours. Does the Chair understand that that is not to interfere with any message?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Not to interfere with any message from the White House or the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Reserving the right to object, will that do away with the taking up of the Unanimous Consent Calendar to-day?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If the unanimous consent is agreed to, the Unanimous Consent Calendar will not be called.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kansas mean to include in his request that after the general debate the Unanimous Consent Calendar shall not be taken up?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is not included in my request made, but I will include it.

Mr. STEENERSON. Reserving the right to object, is there any reason why we should not proceed to-day with the Calendar for Unanimous Consent?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I understand there are only four or five bills on the calendar, and that they are not very important.

Mr. STEENERSON. I have quite an important bill on the calendar, and the parties are very anxious that it should be considered. Of course, if anybody objects, that will be sufficient.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman's request contemplate that the two or three hours' debate shall be devoted to the St. Lawrence Canal?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Two hours on this side are to be devoted to that subject. I am not aware of the nature of the debate on the other side.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am unable to state to the gentleman from Alabama what will be the subject of the speeches on this side. There are gentleman on this side who wish to discuss that proposition, but whether to-day or not I can not tell.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. MANN. The request that the gentleman made was made in the House. My recollection is that throughout the whole history of the House debate on the state of the Union has been held in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. A motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, of course, would be in order. I do not believe that we ought to set a precedent for general debate in the House as distinguished from debate in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois is one that the House should take notice of at this time, and I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and pending that I ask unanimous consent that general debate shall continue for three hours, two hours to be controlled by myself and one hour by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does the gentleman mean that the Unanimous Consent Calendar shall not be called to-day? We might as well include that, because the calendar is very short, and objection could be made to each bill called up.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Is it customary for the House to engage in any business, general debate or otherwise, pending the reply of the President to the committee that the House sends to notify him that it is organized and ready to do business?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; the House is organized.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is not the question. I ask if it is not without precedent for the House to do what the gentleman contemplates it shall do prior to the response of the President to the House committee? In other words, is it not rather discourteous to the Executive for the House to enter upon any business pending this response of the President?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. There is no discourtesy to the President in the House proceeding with its business pending his pleasure in submitting the business that he desires.

Mr. MONTAGUE. May I repeat another phase of the question? If no discourtesy is intended, is it not wholly unprecedented to do what the gentleman asks the House to do, and is not such action an implied discourtesy?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If it is, we can make a precedent at this time.

Mr. MANN. I think it has never been done since I have been here.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The Senate has just passed a bridge bill.

Mr. MANN. The bridge bill was passed at the last session.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and pending that that there shall be three hours' general debate, two hours to be controlled by himself and one hour by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], and that the Unanimous Consent Calendar be not taken up to-day. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, that request is not to interfere with messages or other business of the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Not at all, not to interfere with messages from the White House or the Senate.

Mr. STAFFORD. We will be in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and can not receive messages.

Mr. MANN. We are constantly receiving messages while in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the committee rising to receive the message.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The committee will rise when the messages are received.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], I yield three minutes of my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM].

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, there is now happening in the city of Washington what is destined, in my judgment, to prove an historic event. At this time there is floating over the Capital City the United States Navy dirigible C–7, the first ship of the air filled with helium which has ever flown in the entire world. This accomplishment marks a new era in aviation. This wonderful inert gas affords the long-sought combination of safety and efficiency.

It was my pleasure this morning to attend the landing of the C–7, observed also by many interested spectators who have labored faithfully in the inauguration and development of the helium project. It came to the earth with the ease and grace of a large bird, bearing a confident crew that displayed no nervousness despite the fact that this was an initial experimental trip.

In a flurry of snow it completed its aerial journey from Norfolk, Va., in less than four hours, and is now beginning its return flight by circling in triumph above the Capitol and the departments which have helped to make its achievement possible. The members of the crew participating in this history-making feat are Lieut. Commander Zachary Lansdowne, in command; Lieut. Commander R. F. Wood, Lieut. A. T. Sewell, and Chief Machinist Grover Cleveland Ferris.

A novel incident occurred shortly after the landing at Anacostia. Those gathered about the dirigible were requested to smoke to their heart's content and were furnished the necessary materials for this purpose. Even the pilot in the cockpit was permitted to partake freely of his favorite pipe. Had the dirigible been filled with hydrogen, smoking would have been a reckless flirtation with death. The safe minimum distance of approach to a hydrogen vessel, under such circumstances, is perhaps 100 yards. Around the C–7, inflated with helium, both visitors and crew puffed in perfect safety in the happy realization that science had afforded a dirigible that can travel through the air with all the assurance that a ship can navigate the seas.

After two brief test flights at Hampton Roads, which were entirely successful, the trip to Washington was made without the loss of any helium whatever, despite the fact that the C–7 is of the nonrigid type and not specially designed for aviation of this character.

Thus far helium has met every test, both in manufacture and in the demonstration of its practical use. Until 1917 but a few cubic feet of it had been extracted in the whole world, and that work had been done in laboratories at the prohibitive cost of from $1,700 to $2,000 per cubic foot. In our Government plant at Fort Worth, Tex., from which came the helium which filled the C–7, the cost of extraction has been reduced to a few cents per cubic foot. Surely this is a most creditable and gratifying showing for the operation of a new project which eliminates the possibility of the recurrence of midair explosions which have destroyed so much valuable property and taken such a lamentable toll of human lives.

I wish to call again to the attention of the Congress the fact that the United States has a practical monopoly of the known world supply of helium. Through the plant at Fort Worth, Tex., we have extracted about a million and a half cubic feet during the few months that it has been in operation. It seems to me that our future safety in the air must depend very largely upon the conservation and extraction of this element, which should prove an agency useful in times of peace and of inestimable value in times of war. Let us not be unmindful of the possibilities of this wonderful national asset. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CHALMERS].

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, the subject I am calling to your attention to-day and to the attention of Congress is of vital interest to every man, woman, and child in the United States, from Maine to California, from Washington to Florida. Look through the timber-laden forests of the North and the cotton fields of the South; the great metropolitan centers of population of the country and the small manufacturing hamlets of New England; the cabins in the mountains of Tennessee, to the peoples of the rich fertile soil of the Mississippi Valley and the vast rolling prairie lands—all are hoping, looking, and praying for success.

Did you ever realize what a remarkable body is this House of Representatives? How impossible it would be to consult the people of this vast domain and learn their opinions and wishes in a matter of great national concern. And yet we come here, to this Hall fresh from the people. There is some one in this House from every nook and corner of this great country. There is some one here who knows personally the dweller in every hollow, on every hilltop, in every mountain side, every cross roads, and every broad expanse of vision of this the greatest and richest country of the world.

A great and rich country and yet only partly awake; why partly asleep? Asleep because of restricted circulation. The human organism attains its full strength and stature through full circulation through its veins and arteries. The channels of transportation are the veins and arteries of national life.

The railroads, the waterways, the electric tramways, and motor highways are the channels through which the life blood of our Nation flows. If these veins become clogged, it brings on commercial drowsiness and business stagnation. That is what is the matter with this country to-day.

My colleagues, on the 4th of last March we came direct from the people, coming from every district in every State and Territory in the Union. We came with our commissions of service. We go back to the people again next fall to have these commissions renewed or handed to more representative agents.

My object in coming before you to-day, my colleagues and friends, is to bring to the attention of my people and your people the theme as to how best to insure against future poor business circulation. I address you as colleagues and friends. Have you ever thought how unusual are the friendships formed here? We come here as perfect strangers, representing vastly diversified interests, and yet in a few months we know each other as Joe, Carl, Frank, and Bill.

I also learn that in the formation of these friendships there is no "middle aisle." There is no "middle aisle" in the subject I am bringing to your attention to-day Mr. Chairman. There is no party politics in it. It is just a great bjg subject of immense interest not only to every Member of the Congress and the Government but of interest to every man, woman, and child in the United States. The 28 States lying between the peaks of the Rockies and the Alleghenies are directly interested in it, and the other 20 States of the Union are indirectly interested. Eighteen States, through their legislatures, have formally approved the project. I refer to the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence deep waterway.

By the treaty of January 11, 1909, signed at Washington during the administration of William Howard Taft, the International Joint Commission was created. In 1911 three members were appointed to this commission by the United States and three members were appointed on the part of Canada.

The river and harbor act of March 2, 1919, contained the following item:

That the International Joint Commission created by the treaty between the United States and Great Britain relating to boundary waters between the United States and Canada, signed at Washington January 11, 1909, under the provisions of article 9 of said treaty, is requested to investigate what further improvements of the St. Lawrence River between Montreal and Lake Ontario is necessary to make the same navigable for ocean-going vessels, together with the estimated cost thereof, and report to the Government of the Dominion of Canada and to the Congress of the United States, with its recommendations, for cooperation by the United States with the Dominion of Canada in the improvement of said river.

This order from the Congress was passed on to the International Joint Commission by what is known as the "Reference," in a communication from Secretary of State Lansing, issued January 21, 1920.

This "Reference" required answers to the following questions:

1. What further improvement in the St. Lawrence River, between Montreal and Lake Ontario, is necessary to make same navigable for deep-draft vessels of either the lake or ocean going type? What draft of water is recommended and what is the estimated cost?

In answering this question the commission is requested to consider:

(a) Navigation interests alone, whether by the construction of locks and dams in the river, by side canals with the necessarys locks, or by a combination of the two.

(b) The combination of navigation and power interests to obtain the greatest beneficial use of the waters of the river.

2. Which of the schemes submitted by the Government or other engineers is preferred and why?

3. Under what general method of procedure and in what general order shall the various physical and administrative features of the improvement be carried out?

4. Upon what basis shall the capital cost of the completed improvement be apportioned to each country?

5. Upon what basis shall the cost of operation and maintenance be apportioned to each country?

6. What method of control is recommended for the operation of the improved waterway to secure its most beneficial use?

7. Will regulating Lake Ontario increase the low-water flow in the St. Lawrence ship channel below Montreal, and, if so, to what extent and at what additional cost?

8. To what extent will the improvement develop the resources, commerce, and industry of each country?

9. What traffic, both incoming and outgoing, in kind and quantity, is likely to be carried upon the proposed route both at its inception and in the future, consideration to be given not only to present conditions but to probable changes therein resulting from the development of industrial activities due to availability of large quantities of hydraulic power?

Mr. Lansing also wrote a letter of instructions to the engineers asking them to take charge of the survey of the St. Lawrence River, Montreal to Lake Ontario, for the purpose of preparing plans and estimates for its further improvement to make same navigable for deep-draft vessels of either Lake or ocean-going type and to obtain the greatest beneficial use from the waters.

The order to the engineers also requested that their plans and estimates should definitely cover the four general schemes or methods of improvement referred to in the "reference," but other variations of them may be considered and, if deemed advisable, also presented to the commission.

The channels to be considered are to be of 25 and 30 feet depth at low water, and the plans and estimates should be prepared accordingly. A choice between them will, under the terms of the "reference," be made by the commission.

The engineers appointed to conduct the surveys were Col. W. P. Wooten, for the United States, and Mr. W. A. Bowden, for the Dominion of Canada.

During the past 20 months the International Joint Commission has held 40 hearings in all the large cities from Montreal, Boston, and New York, on the east, to Portland and Seattle, on the west. A final review was held at Detroit, Mich., since this Congress has been in session; also, a special hydroelectric-power hearing at Ottawa, Canada, on the 14th of last month, and the final joint session will be held in Washington day after to-morrow. The engineers have reported favorably, and the report of the International Joint Commission will recommend the construction of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence deep waterway.

In response to the request of the Secretary of State, after more than a year of intensive study, with all the assistance of the engineering experts of the two nations, the official engineers, Col. Wooten and Mr. Bowden, unanimously recommended the development of the project.

I quote the following summary of their conclusions and recommendations:

A. That the physical conditions are favorable for improvement for navigation which will be permanent and will have very low upkeep cost.

B. That improvement of the entire reach from Montreal to Lake Ontario for navigation alone is feasible, but the loss of power that can be generated as a by-product in some reaches is not warranted.

C. That the development of nearly all the potential power in the river amounting to approximately 4,100,000 horsepower can be made to coordinate parts of schemes for the improvement of navigation.

D. That the simultaneous development of such a vast quantity of power is not a sound economic procedure, as a market to take this output is not now in existence, and can not be expected to spring into being at once.

E. That the sound method of procedure is to improve for navigation along those reaches where side canals and locks can most economically be used and where the development of the power at some future time is not interfered with by the proposed improvement; and in that part of the river where the construction of locks and dams offers the most feasible means of improving navigation, to provide for the development of the incidental power obtainable as a result of the head created by the dams.

F. That the improvement of the first division, from Montreal Harbor to Lake St. Louis, is made by locks and side canals.

G. That the canal sections be excavated to a depth of 25 feet, and a bottom width varying from 220 feet in through cuttings to 450 feet in submerged or submarine channels. That provision for the future widening of this waterway be made from Victoria Bridge to west of the town of Verdun. That the locks be built for an eventual depth of 30 feet over the sills.

H. That the improvement of the second division, from lake St. Louis to lake St. Francis, be made in either of two ways. The first of these is by means of a side canal from Melocheville to Hungry Bay with flight locks at Melocheville.

K. That the improvement of the third division, Lake St. Francis to the head of St. Regis Island, be carried out by the dredging of a channel 450 feet wide and 25 feet deep at low water.

L. That the improvement of the fourth division, from the foot of St. Regis Island to Chimney Point, near Ogdensburg, be made by a dam at Long Sault Rapids and side canals with locks from the pool created by this dam to a junction with the river at Cornwall; also, by a dam with a side canal and lock at Ogden Island, near Waddington, N. Y., by considerable channel enlargement below Cornwall and in the stretch between the head of Ogden Island and deep water above Galop Rapids.

N. That the improvement of the fifth division will require the removal of certain shoals and the widening and straightening of the present channel.

O. That the total cost of improvement from Montreal to Lake Ontario, as recommended above, to afford 25 feet at present, with such provisions that a 30-foot depth may be secured at a later date without interfering with the use of the waterway, is $252,728,000. This includes the cost of developing 1,464,000 horsepower. That the total annual cost of operation, maintenance, and depreciation of these works is $2,562,000. Of this sum, $1,457,000 is properly chargeable to the operation and maintenance and depreciation of power plants.

That the estimated cost of increasing the navigable depth throughout the entire stretch to 30 feet at a later date is $17,986,180.

P. That the improvements are carried on simultaneously, it will be possible to complete them in eight years from the time the work is begun, if funds are made available as fast as needed.

Q. That the construction of Ogden Island Dam affords a control over the level of Lake Ontario and the flow in the St. Lawrence River. That this control can be exercised so as to raise the mean level of Lake Ontario without causing it to fluctuate beyond the limits which it has reached in previous years.

That the more intangible assets to be derived from this improvement, such as the development of industries in both countries, the advantage of deep-water navigation from the ocean to the Great Lakes, the saving of coal, and the improvement of railroad freight conditions, while of great importance to the two countries, are not considered in this report, as the engineers do not understand that their instructions cover an investigation of these matters.

I propose to treat this subject under three general heads: 1, Feasibility; 2, availability; and 3, practicability. In other words, first, can it be done; second, will it be used; third, will it pay?

The great engineers of this country and Canada have answered the first question in the affirmative. Col. Wooten and Mr. Bowden, after long study, definite surveys and plans and specifications, have reported to both sections of the commission that the construction of this project is a simple engineering feat. I make the assertion that there is not a responsible engineer who will claim that there are any insurmountable engineering difficulties in the way of the completion of a 30-foot channel from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic Ocean.

How God must have marveled at the foolishness of the children of men who have not long since solved the simple problem he has set before us with an answer in plain view. What an easy matter, physically and scientifically, to clear away the barriers and turn the Great Lakes into a Baltic or Mediterranean Sea and bring the Atlantic Ocean within 100 miles of the center of population of the United States!

Let us consider the second question. Will this water highway be used if completed? That is easy to answer. It is used now. With all its handicaps and obstructions, it is used now.

The Detroit River to-day, connecting two land-bound inland lakes, carries more shipping than any other similar stretch of water in the world.

The World Almanac for 1921 gives the freight passing through the Suez Canal annually as 9,251,601 tons; the Panama Canal as 8,545,653 tons. Nelson's Loose Leaf Encyclopedia gives the annual freight passing through the Manchester Ship Canal as 3,161,012 tons. While, listen, my colleagues, the commerce passing through the Detroit River in 1919 was 73,526,602 freight tons, valued at $771,294,055, nearly a billion dollars. Have I said enough about the practical use of this waterway when completed?

Mr. Chairman, I call your attention to the third and last question, "Will it pay?" Will it pay to make the Great Lakes ports ocean ports connecting the Great Lakes with the ocean by a 30-foot channel 220 feet wide at its lowest depth at a total expense of $270,000,000, $135,000,000 to be guaranteed by the United States and $135,000,000 by Great Britain? This also includes the cost of developing 1,464,000 hydroelectric horsepower, the power station to be within the territory of the United States, close to the Canadian line, only 270 miles from Boston.

This power in Boston is worth $70 per year per horsepower, or over $100,000,000 annually when transferred to Boston at present prices. But placing the power value at the generating station at only $20 per year per horsepower, the income from the sale of this power would not only pay all annual expenses of operation, maintenance, and depreciation of these works and 5 per cent interest on the $270,000,000 issued to complete the project, but would form a sinking fund that would liquidate all expenses of constructing this great waterway and equipping the power plant in thirteen and a half years. From that point on, what a great source of revenue this would be to the Government!

Again, the construction and operation of the waterway would add to the value of the agricultural resources of this country more each year than the total cost of its construction. The price of any product is fixed at the place where that product comes in competition with similar products from the rest of the world. The price of wheat, therefore, is made in Liverpool. The opening of this canal will add 10 cents or more to the value of every bushel of wheat in the United States. The same principle would hold true for every other agricultural product. The same principle holds true in the shipment of every article of commerce.

The people of the Mississippi Valley are as much interested in the opening of this way to the sea as they are in the development of the Mississippi, the Ohio, and Missouri Rivers.

Improvement of the St. Lawrence will bring the ocean to Buffalo, Erie, Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit, Duluth, Superior, Milwaukee, Michigan City, and Chicago—1,500 miles nearer to the great bread basket and cream jug of the world—the Mississippi Valley.

If this great producing section of our country is to hold its own in the fight for world trade, this transportation question must be settled and settled right. The railroads are hopelessly behind. The greatest railroad executive of the age, Mr. James J. Hill, said that our railroads should have a billion dollars spent upon them annually for 15 years to keep them up to the demands of our natural commercial growth.

It would be a national sin to delay longer the completion of this much-needed public improvement. You ask why I call it a national sin? You know there are sins of omission as well as sins of commission. The deep waterway would bring great, permanent prosperity to this country. It would serve not only directly the 28 States referred to but indirectly every State and Territory in the Union.

To solve the problem of transportation for 28 States would lift the burden from the railroads and other systems of transportation so that there would be no more breakdowns when the peak load comes. In other words, water transportation would relieve the excessive demands at times of great stress just as relief and elasticity have come to the financial demands at crop-moving times by the act organizing regional banks and the revising of the banking laws.

Gov. Harding, of Iowa, says that a bushel of wheat can be shipped from Duluth to Buffalo for 2 cents; from Buffalo to the ocean-going boats for 17 cents; and from the ocean-going boats to Liverpool for 14 cents. This is the present method.

With the St. Lawrence canal, a bushel of wheat could be shipped from Duluth to Montreal for 3 cents, and from Montreal to Liverpool for 12 cents. The difference of 12 or 18 cents in transportation cost could go into the pockets of the American farmers.

You know that Liverpool fixes the market price of world foodstuffs. It is the place where surplus food is shipped from all parts of the world. The South Dakota farmers get the Liverpool prices for their wheat. Whenever Buffalo and New York take a toll of 15 cents on a bushel of wheat they are taking it from the farmers of the Middle West.

I can not look the producers in the face when I know that a barrier of from 12 to 15 cents is between them and a bushel of grain—a barrier that can be removed. And the parties in Washington can not afford to overlook that either. This thing of starting four carloads from the West to New York and having three carloads taken for freight charges can not go on. Corn was selling last week for 15 cents a bushel in Iowa. If this project were completed, it would be bringing four times that price.

The railroads fell down in 1914. Since then no new roads have been built. Nothing has been spent for terminals. A box car can make only one trip a season from the West to New York. Where are you going to get money to improve the railroads? Certainly not from higher freight rates. They are now more than the traffic will stand.

If this waterway were completed, freight could be moved to any ocean port of Europe, Asia, Africa, South America, or the islands of the sea before a loaded freight car could be moved by rail from Buffalo to New York and placed on board an ocean-going liner during the peak load of freight congestion.

At the Detroit hearing last spring I heard a Government engineer say that during 1919–20 they found cars that had been on the road so long that on the contents the dust and dirt had collected and the rain had fallen and that vegetation had grown 2 feet high before the car had reached its destination. He said that they had found loaded freight cars on sidetracks where birds had built nests on the trucks, the mother bird had laid her eggs, hatched her young, and departed with her brood before the switching crew had seen fit to depart with the car and send it on its way toward its destination.

These were some of the rail delays reported by a United States officer at the Detroit hearing. But not so with water shipments. Tear down the barriers and open the Great Lakes ports to the sea and we will show you what service is. Do you know that we have the most modern and most scientific loading and unloading facilities in the world? In September of this year the D. G. Kerr broke all records in loading at the Two Harbors dock in Minnesota. She loaded 12,382 gross tons of iron ore in 16½ minutes. She was at the dock only 19 minutes. Less that 20 minutes from the time she arrived at dock she was headed down the lake with full cargo. She also broke the world's record in unloading five days later at Conneaut, Ohio. She was entirely relieved of the 12,382 tons of freight in 3 hours and 5 minutes.

Contrast that service with the port of New York. A recent editorial in a New York daily says that it costs 24 cents to bring a bushel of potatoes from Michigan to the Hudson River in New Jersey but 47 cents and 4 days to bring them across the river and over the docks and piers to the Manhattan consumers.

The trouble with progress in the past has been that we Americans have been taught to read, write, and spell in rail transportation terms only. Other nations have kept waterways apace with their rail routes. We do not understand that language. We regard commerce from the rail standpoint only. We do our commercial thinking in the language of railroads.

We are just in the morning of the electric day. The greatest progress in science and invention in this age will be made in the electric field. Watch for surprises in the Oregon Exposition in 1925.

The New England States are interested in this project, particularly from possibilities from its hydroelectric development. The St. Lawrence River drains one-fourth of the American Continent north of the Mexican border and in its course falls 221 feet and is capable of delivering more than 4,000,000 continuous horsepower. This is equal to the energy created by the burning of 40,000,000 tons of coal in the most modern steam plant. These figures are startling.

On January 27, 1919, the Secretary of the Interior sent to Congress a supplemental estimate of—an appropriation in the sum of $200,000 for a special investigation and report on the power supply for the Boston-Washington industrial region to be made during the fiscal year 1920.

An appropriation of $125,000, carried in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1921, among the items under the United States Geological Survey, authorized the proposed investigation in the following language:

For the survey of power production and distribution in the United States, including the study of methods for the further realization of water power and the special investigation of the possible economy of fuel, labor, and materials resulting from the use of the Boston-Washington industrial region of a comprehensive system for the generation and distribution of electricity to transportation lines and industries, and the preparation of reports thereon, $125,000. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to receive any sums which may be contributed for this purpose. Such sums shall be deposited in the Treasury and credited to the appropriation herein made and be available for expenditure for the purposes thereof.

This resulted in an elaborate report, Professional Paper 123, issued recently by the Interior Department, W. S. Murray, chief engineer, recommending a superpower circuit including Boston, New York, Baltimore, and Washington, and adjacent territory.

A superpower zone along these same lines could be developed for the cities of Buffalo, Syracuse, Rochester, Toronto, Cleveland, Toledo, and Detroit.

My own opinion is that a major superpower circuit can be created, taking in all cities and towns within the following outer circle: Boston, New York, Baltimore, Washington, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit, Buffalo, Toronto, and Montreal. In other words, including all territory in New England, New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, and a part of the Dominion of Canada.

This improvement is something for which the Nation has been waiting for many years. It seems incredible to me that it was not consummated years ago. Starting of work on this project soon will do much to alleviate the unemployment problem that is confronting the country. It will provide work for thousands directly and many other thousands indirectly. It will stimulate business and doubtless will be a major factor in restoring America to normal.

It is time that we were about our country's business. Too long have we idled and wasted. Let us start in earnest to recuperate the losses we have suffered as a result of inertia that followed the World War. Let us erect in this waterway a monument to American enterprise. When completed it will stand out as the greatest constructive policy of the age.

This project is more than a mere business proposition. Its potential possibilities are limitless. It contains romance, comedy, tragedy, life, and death, not only to this generation but to countless generations yet unborn. Let us be pioneers and promoters of this the greatest and most beneficent enterprise of the age.

As I look back over the years, I ask myself why the big-visioned men of the past failed to utilize this wonderful natural resource. It means greater prosperity for the country—not for any select section but for all our people. The completion of this waterway is a program that interests all of us. No matter what section of the country we come from we must work together for this one great cause. It is too big and too important a thing to permit sectional rivalries to overshadow our sense of justice and fairness. In the final analysis prosperity can come to America only when all the people are prosperous and the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence River improvement will do much to bring about that desired end. There is no excuse for prejudice and no reason for jealousy.

While we are meeting and will meet much selfish opposition from New York City, the New York Times, one of the leaders of thought in the world to-day, ran an editorial about a year ago warning those opponents that their attitude was parochial and provincial. The New York Times was right. We who favor this project wish New York well. We are proud of New York. We have helped make her great, and we will continue to do so. The Congress has lavished many millions on her harbor improvements in the past and will undoubtedly hold a liberal policy toward our leading American port in the future, but as Senator LENROOT has said:

New York must learn that it is unwise to come to us holding out their hat for a donation in one hand while a brickbat is concealed in the other.

She should not be jealous of any proposition that will add wealth and riches to the West and South. We of the Middle West always go to New York to spend our money. If this opportunity should add a half billion to the States north, west, and south of her, New York would finally get most of the money. Remember I don't underestimate the power, financial strength, and finesse of the opponents.

You will find that the New York interests, when they begin their campaign to kill off this improvement, will count heavily upon what may be called their "patriotic appeal." Do not spend money in foreign territory.

"Why help the foreign port of Montreal at the expense of the port of New York?" "We have plenty of demands for our money at home without spending it in a foreign country." In order to spike their guns in anticipation of their patriotic-appeal barrage, I asked a New York official about waterways from the State of New York into the Dominion of Canada. Almost boastfully he set up the following special service. In his letter he said:

Thank you for your letter of recent date in regard to the development of the Hudson River. We have delayed in answering this until we could secure complete and accurate information regarding the connection between the New York Barge Canal and Hudson River and the St. Lawrence River by way of Lake Champlain. The information is as follows:

By means of the Champlain Canal, Lake Champlain, and the Canadian waterways, a direct route is provided for the use of commerce between New York Harbor and the St. Lawrence River. The course of a boat bound from New York Harbor to the St. Lawrence River would be northerly through the Hudson River to the United States Government lock at Troy; thence still northerly through what is known as the Champlain Canal at Whitehall; thence through Lake Champlain, crossing the Canadian boundary line a short distance above Rouses Point. From this point northerly the navigable channels are under the jurisdiction of the Dominion Government. The River Richelieu is followed downstream 23 miles to the entrance of the Chambly Canal at St. Johns. From St. Johns the Chambly Canal extends to the Chambly Basin; at the northerly end of the canal the Richelieu River is again entered and is navigated for a distance of 32 miles to the St. Ours Lock. From St. Ours Lock to Sorel, through the River Richelieu, is 14 miles. At Sorel the Richelieu joins the St. Lawrence River, and by way of the St. Lawrence from Sorel to Montreal is 46 miles. The total distance from New York City to the St. Lawrence River at Sorel is 402 miles.

It is right, proper, and patriotic for New York to build a canal into foreign territory, but it is wrong, wicked, and high treason for the West to connect up the Great Lakes with the St. Lawrence River.

Referring to this New York opposition in the hearings held by the International Joint Commission in New York City, Secretary of Commerce Herbert Hoover said:

I do not believe that the argument that New York would suffer is borne out by any experience in the expansion of transportation facilities, in view of the improvement of the whole economic condition of the country. New York rests on the commerce and the business of the United States, and if any project can improve the whole prosperity and productivity of the United States, we all have benefits, and New York City immeasurably benefits, notwithstanding any deprivation of port dues she might suffer through the transmission of wheat by this Great Lakes-St. Lawrence route. Food products I look upon as being the major use of such a route, at least until we have built up further industrial activities in the interior.

That is pretty strong testimony from the head of the Department of Commerce of the United States and also an expert engineer.

The settlement of this problem has become a national moral issue as well as a business one. The Grand Architect of the Universe is constantly gathering the waters from the surface of the seas of the world and dropping them down in the form of sparkling dews and gentle rains in the great basin and valley of the St. Lawrence, which drains over one-third of the North American Continent. These waters flow into the great St. Lawrence to enter again upon their perpetual round which began in the early morning of creation and will end only when the shadows of dark night close the last day of eternity.

This annual flow of water as it comes through the St. Lawrence, dropping 220 feet in 181 miles, offers potential energy annually equivalent to 40,000,000 tons of coal. And we have been digging the coal from the bowels of the earth, exhausting the supply that can never be replaced, while we have allowed the hydroelectric equivalent to go to waste; when it is over the falls it is gone forever. This enterprise will spread the blessing of prosperity over more than two-thirds of the people of the United States. It has been shown by the experts that 41,000,000 people of the United States will be directly benefited by transatlantic traffic and 30,000,000 people will be interested in Central and South American shipments and that other millions will be interested in coastwise trading. The other third of our population will be directly benefited by having better service from the railroads that will be relieved from the impossible demands made upon them. Of our 105,000,000 people 70,000,000 will be directly benefited and the other 35,000,000 indirectly.

Although the West, the Middle West, and the South have been paying their tribute to the port of New York for decades, I am glad that we can come to you to-day asking for the approval of this project and not asking the Government to make the appropriation for its construction. I believe the electric power generated as a by-product in this construction will more than care for the financial requirements.

The Chicago Tribune less than a month ago announced at the head of its editorial page this platform: "A square deal in Congress for the Middle West."

In its first editorial it asked that Congress should not longer hold back the comparatively few millions necessary to open the ports of the world to the Middle West through the St. Lawrence seaway. I add my appeal and ask you to give a square deal to the Middle West, the West, and the South.

After a careful study and a clear understanding of the plans proposed and recommended, so simple, so easy of construction, and with such a small financial outlay, in my opinion it is an international crime that the project was not completed decades ago. Let me bring some encouragement to the proponents of this measure—the Great Lakes region will win its way to the sea. Nothing can stop it now. Opposition will be swept away just as the barriers of the St. Lawrence will be swept away.

As a student of history I have learned how permanent and persistent is truth. "God's in His heaven; all's right with the world," simply means that right will prevail. Fads and false ideals have come to the front and held attention for a time and then vanished away. False prophets have arisen and after a time have been forgotten. But everlasting truth carries on. Since the creation there has been present in the human breast the hope that cruel, bloody warfare should cease. We read in Isaiah, second chapter and fourth verse, "Nations shall not lift up sword against nations, neither shall they have war any more." This vision of the great prophet Isaiah has haunted the imagination of the human race ever since his day. This ideal has occupied the attention of men and nations from time to time through the past 2,500 years. It is our hope and prayer that the thoughts and aspirations of the ages shall be realized in our time, and that the international conference now being held in our National Capital shall lock the hasp and close the history of world wars for eternity.

I am digressing, Mr. Chairman, to illustrate the persistency of truth. In the last 2,500 years many things have come into the human mind only to be cast out again. All sorts of vagaries, hallucinations, and fantastic dreams have passed through the human mind only to be cast out and left behind. But this vision of the ancient Hebrew prophet has lived in the human heart through all these generations. Science teaches us to find deep significance in phenomena that are persistent. Anything that continues through a long number of years is something that must be reckoned with, because it is a part of the great world order. The very fact that the vision of Isaiah has come with undiminished vigor and attractiveness through so many generations to fruition in our day is evidence that it is not only a vision of man but also an idea of God; an indisputable feature of His universe.

The idea and necessity for the improvement of this waterway have persisted for over 250 years—since Father La Salle on July 6, 1669, started up the St. Lawrence with his 4 canoes and 14 men to explore the Great Lakes and Mississippi region and were compelled to carry their craft around the falls and other hindrances to navigation. It would be interesting to trace step by step the progress made in the development of this waterway from that time to the present. Suffice to say that the time is at hand to perfect the task of centuries and clear away all barriers and open this rich region to the markets of the world.

In closing let me give to the opponents to this project the advice that Gamaliel, a doctor of the law, gave to the Sadducees, as recorded in the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth verses of the fifth chapter of the Acts:

> And now I say unto you, refrain from these men, and let them alone: for if this counsel or this work be of men, it will come to naught: but if it be of God, ye can not overthrow it; lest haply ye be found even to fight against God.

This ideal has persisted for nearly three centuries. It is right. It will be consummated. Within 10 years I expect to see the ships from the merchant marine of the world lashed to the docks of my home city. I hope to see the ships of all nations plowing the deep blue waters of the Great Lakes, flying the flags of all the civilized countries of the world, a picture of national success, happiness, and prosperity of all our people. But I hope that the flag that will be the most visioned in this world fleet will be our national emblem, the Stars and Stripes. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHALMERS. I have not the time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I shall be glad to yield the gentleman one minute.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I take it for granted that the gentleman is interested in the prices the farmers in the West will get for their grain?

Mr. CHALMERS. Very much interested.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Is it not a fact that if Montreal becomes the export harbor for grain in North America and Liverpool becomes the import port and the grain is carried in English ships, that England will control the price of the grain, and, being a consuming nation, will reduce the price of wheat lower than what the farmers might save in freight if this project goes through?

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from New York that it is not the intention of the proponents of this project to make Montreal an export port. It is proposed to make Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit, Chicago, Milwaukee, Duluth, Superior, all of the Great Lakes ports, export ports. The ships loaded with grain from the West will sail by Montreal and land their grain in Liverpool. [Applause.]

During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the following occurred:

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ARENTZ, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the state of the Union and had come to no resolution thereon.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE TO WAIT UPON THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the committee appointed by the Speaker, with a similar committee appointed by the Vice President, visited the President of the United States and notified him that the two Houses found themselves with a quorum, ready to proceed to business, and would be pleased to receive any communication he desires to make to them. The President notified us that he would be pleased to address the Congress in person, in joint session, at 12.30 o'clock to-morrow afternoon.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

JOINT MEETING OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I present the following resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have considered at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming offers the following resolution, which the clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 32.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Tuesday, the 6th day of December, 1921, at 12.30 o'clock in the afternoon for the purpose of receiving such communications as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Wyoming if it is expected, if this resolution be adopted, that admission to the galleries will be by card to-morrow?

Mr. MONDELL. That is the usual practice, and the usual practice will be followed, as I understand it.

Mr. WALSH. Well, I desire likewise to ask if the general populace is to be admitted to the floor of the House, as was the case on the last occasion when the President addressed the two Houses, or if it is to be reserved for Members of the House and Senate who are to receive the message?

Mr. MONDELL. I assume the officers of the House will see that the rules of the House in that regard are observed.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think the officers of the House are to be blamed for the admission of others than Members at the last session.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I trust there will be no ground for complaint on that score to-morrow. Of course, I assume Members will not encourage anyone seeking a place on the floor who is not entitled to the floor under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a further inquiry of the gentleman from Wyoming for the information of Members relative to the order of business to-morrow. I believe a program has been sent out from the majority leader's office advising there would be general debate on the state of the Union to-morrow.

Mr. MONDELL. The practice in the House of late has been to refer the President's message to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. My thought was to ask for a certain amount of general debate on the President's message, which would, of course, include general debate on such subjects as Members might desire to discuss to-morrow for such time as might seem proper after receiving the President's message and after the close of the joint session.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman from Wyoming yield while he is on his feet?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I think the gentleman is to be congratulated upon having adopted the practice of making a weekly forecast of the business of the House. I know I have found it most helpful in enabling me to keep track of the business and I think that is the experience of other Members. I find, however, that the tentative plan he has furnished Members for the present week does not attempt to specify the business that will be taken up on Calendar Wednesday. I would ask my friend if he does not think it possible in the future to give more specific information in reference to the Calendar Wednesday business? On the call of committees, of course, there can be resort to the Union Calendar or the House Calendar, and without such a specification it is impossible for Members to know in advance what bills will be called up by the chairmen. Would it be possible for the gentleman to ascertain that information in time to include it in his weekly announcements?

Mr. MONDELLL. The gentleman from Virginia realizes, of course, that in presenting this tentative program that it must be subject to change, and, further, it has at times been very difficult to suggest a program as accurate as we would like to have it. Ordinarily, when the bulletin has been issued, we have been able to give with reasonable accuracy the measures that were likely to be taken up on Calendar Wednesday, but for various reasons it was impossible to say with certainty at the time the bulletin was issued on Saturday what would be taken up on Calendar Wednesday. I hope to place a new bulletin on the bulletin board this afternoon or to-morrow morning which will give the business on Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I think what the gentleman is doing is a great improvement. In the last Congress when I came here it was difficult to know even an hour or so in advance what business was to be transacted at a given session, but now we are relieved of that difficulty, and in my opinion the gentleman is entitled to the thanks of the House. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

THE BUDGET.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President:

To the Congress of the United States:

I submit herewith the budget of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923. It will be noted that the estimated ordinary expenditures for 1922 show a reduction of $1,513,537,682.20, compared with the actual ordinary expenditures for 1921; and that the estimated ordinary expenditures for 1923 show a reduction of $447,704,239 under 1922, making the estimated ordinary expenditures under the budget for 1923 $1,961,241,921.20 less than the actual ordinary expenditures for 1921. Including transactions in the principal of the public debt and investments of trust funds, the total estimated expenditures for 1922 show a reduction under the total actual expenditures for 1921 of $1,570,118,323.30 and the total estimated expenditures for 1923 show a reduction of $462,167,639 under the total estimated expenditures for 1922, making a reduction in total expenditures in the estimated budget for 1923, as compared with the total actual expenditures for 1921, of $2,032,285,962.30. It will also be noted that the total estimated receipts for 1922 are in approximate balance with the total estimated expenditures, including reduction in the principal of the public debt, and that the total estimated receipts for 1923 are within approximately $150,000,000 of a balance with the total estimated expenditures of that year. Such a discrepancy is unavoidable when authorizations of expenditure are being enacted during the process of budget closing, but ways are provided for relatively easy adjustment, without added taxation.

For the purpose of providing a portion of the funds necessary to balance the budget for 1923, in which the estimated expenditures exceed the estimated receipts by the sum of approximately $150,000,000, I recommend the following legislation in connection with the naval appropriation bill for 1923, which would result in the eventual automatic release of $100,000,000 now held in the naval supply account of the Navy Department:

"Hereafter, until the naval supply account shall have been reduced to a maximum sum of $150,000,000, which shall not thereafter be exceeded, one-half of all reimbursements otherwise due to the naval supply account, whether from current issues or from sales, shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts, and only one-half shall be credited to the naval supply account."

With continued pressure for economy in all departments and the passage of such legislation, the balancing of total receipts and total expenditures for the fiscal years 1922 and 1923 should be accomplished.

I also transmit herewith the report of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget on the budget of the United States and the operations of the Bureau of the Budget.

The details of the budget are shown in the accompanying statements, and may be briefly summarized as follows:

BUDGET SUMMARY.

Exclusive of postal revenues and postal expenditures paid from postal revenues.

	1923, estimated.	1922, estimated.	1921, actual.
Total receipts	$3,338,182,750	$3,943,453,663	$5,624,932,960.91
Total expenditures, including reduction in principal of public debt	3,505,754,727	3,967,922,366	5,538,040,689.30
Excess of expenditures	167,571,977	24,468,703
Excess of receipts			86,892,271.61

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 5, 1921.

The SPEAKER. Referred to the Committee on Appropriations with accompanying papers and ordered printed.

ALTERNATIVE BUDGET.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President:

To the Congress of the United States:

I submit herewith the alternative budget for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, as required by section 205 of the budget and accounting act, 1921.

The information regarding revenues and expenditures is the same as that contained in the budget, with such changes in arrangement as will better present the facts in connection with the spending departments.

The estimates of appropriations in the alternative budget have been so assembled and correlated that all estimates for any given department are included in one chapter.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 5, 1921.

The SPEAKER. Referred to the Committee on Appropriations, with accompanying papers, and ordered printed.

CODIFICATION OF STATUTES RELATING TO THE BUDGET.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a codification of the Federal statutes relating to the preparation and transmission to Congress of statements of receipts and expenditures of the Government and of estimates of appropriations, in accordance with the provisions of section 210 of the budget and accounting act, 1920.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 5, 1921.

The SPEAKER. Referred to the Select Committee on the Budget, with accompanying papers, and ordered printed.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

S. 2710. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Pamunkey Ferry Co. to construct a bridge across the Pamunkey River in Virginia.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of absence for Mr. MANSFIELD, of Texas; Mr. TAYLOR, of Colorado; Mr. FLOOD, of Virginia; and Mr. BRAND, of Georgia, indefinitely, on account of illness in each case.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the requests are granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request on behalf of the gentleman from New York, Mr. HAMILTON FISH.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

GENERAL DEBATE.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN].

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am sorry that this discussion has been projected upon the floor of the House without notice. You can easily conceive that New York State and the city of New York are necessarily vitally affected by and interested in this proposed plan to open up the St. Lawrence River. I am not going into the breach to-day—without notice and unprepared as I am—with the view that I am in any sense fitted to immediately meet all the arguments which have been presented by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CHALMERS]. There are other men in this House on both sides who are more fully acquainted with all of the ramifications of this subject than I am. I wish that our good friend, for instance, from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY], the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, were here. He has made a study of this subject and is equipped to meet every argument.

The arguments in favor of the St. Lawrence project have been presented under the three heads: (1) That it is feasible. (2) That it will be used. (3) That it will pay.

With the first contention I have no quarrel. I would hate to have myself included among those doubters who greet every suggestion for the improvement of mankind with the invariable, monotonous, and thick-headed response, "It can not be done." I do not like the sound of "can not" and am constitutionally sympathetic to the "open sesame" of "It can." I hope and believe that the undertaking is feasible. The courage, enterprise, and scientific attainments of the age which overcame the engineering difficulties of the Panama Canal and the New York Barge Canal can overcome, I have no doubt, the difficulties of the St. Lawrence project.

Will it be used? I am not so sure of that. If it were completed to-day, it is quite obvious it would not be used. The interests and sections which are clamoring for this project have the New York Barge Canal at their disposal, yet it is not used. Last year the barge canal carried 2,000,000 tons, although its total capacity is upward of 25,000,000 tons. It is, of course, claimed that the excessive charges for the transfer of freight from boats to cars or to ocean ships at the port of New York preclude the extensive use of the barge canal by western shippers. I will, however, show that contention is false and only a part of the wide propaganda invoked for the popularizing of the St. Lawrence project in certain quarters.

There is no doubt that a canal such as contemplated could be used by barges and specially constructed lake vessels; but the purpose is, I understand, to construct a type of vessel of great tonnage and draft designed to navigate the great freshwater Lakes, the locks and stretches of the proposed canal, and the salt and stormy ocean. This is a question which presents some very difficult problems in marine engineering. Experts differ as to whether or not it can be done. Assuming that it can be done, we are confronted with another collateral and incidental problem, namely: Can an ocean-going ship requiring a very large and expensive crew—a ship, for instance, which relies upon the speed of its ocean trips to make money for its owners—can such a ship afford to drop from a speed of 15 knots on the high seas to, say, 4 knots in an inland waterway? With such a reduction of speed there would follow a corresponding prolongation of the trip and a very pronounced augmentation of operating expenses.

The question is, Is the margin safe enough to insure the operation of such vessels in competition with the existing waterways and railroads? That question is not as yet determined, and is still a matter of conjecture, with all the probabilities against the innovation.

The last appeal is that the project is going to pay. That contention is based on the assumption that the canal can be built and that it can be operated by the class of triple convertible vessels I have described. Of course, they are as yet in the imagination of some enthusiastic marine engineer. They might be called now "triple-dexterous" ships. What they might be called after construction and actual trial, I will not venture to say. But to say that a thing is going to pay after you have surmounted, in your imagination, all the steps necessary to actual trial is very much like counting your chickens before they are hatched.

But I am not going to take the position that all of these difficulties can not be surmounted. I hope, when the time comes, that they will be surmounted.

Let us assume that the canal is built. By a number of locks between the head of the rapids at Ogdensburg, N. Y., and the foot of the lowest rapid at the city of Montreal there will be a drop in the water level of 221 feet. This fall of water they calculate is going to produce 1,464,000 horsepower. And by the sale of this in New York and in the New England States they assume that they are going to pay the cost of maintenance, the interest on the bonds, and set enough aside in a sinking fund to pay off the whole debt in 50 years.

This, of course, is more counting of chickens before they are hatched, and has been obviously devised while the plan is in the last throes of death to save it from premature burial. They could not expect the Federal Government to guarantee an admitted expenditure of $252,000,000—merely estimated—without devising some plan to appear on its face to save the Government from ultimate loss. You will notice they take the rather long period of 50 years for the confirmation of their glowing prophecies. None of those, however, who make the prophecies are likely to be alive to stand trial for false representation, or, if they are, they will be so old as to make their prosecution farcical.

What I want to ask is this: "If this hydroelectric power proposition is so alluring, why do not some of you gentlemen of sporting instincts take a chance at it yourselves? Why link it up with the waterway proposition at all?"

The gentleman from Ohio made a very temperate, a very strong, and a very reasonable argument in favor of his side of the proposition.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Surely.

Mr. HICKS. Is it not a fact, I ask my friend from New York, that if this ship canal was constructed it would mean that all the ships passing into the canal or out of it, for ultimate destination across the sea or from the other side, would have to go through foreign territory, and, no matter how friendly the foreign power may now be, would it not be a mistake to put our money on a soil and in a project where we could not control the canal itself?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Of course, that is the military and naval viewpoint. That, however, does not give me much concern. I am very glad that this country has been at peace for so many years with our neighbor across the border, and I hope and believe that that blessed relationship will continue for many years to come.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield in that particular?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman from New York or any of his colleagues think that the treaty that has existed between our Government and Great Britain for more than 100 years, which limits the number of naval vessels to two minor cutters, and the like, on the Great Lakes, will be abrogated, notwithstanding the consummation of the wonderful Limitation of Armament Conference that is going on in Washington?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I say frankly that I have no such fear, and I had no idea of presenting that side of the question. It is quite natural for my friend from New York [Mr. HICKS], who is on the Naval Committee, to look at the proposition from the naval standpoint. I, however, prefer to take the hopeful view that peace between the United States and Canada shall be perpetual. In my discussion of this project I prefer to take the broad and tolerant view that it is commendable in our western neighbors, our Northwestern States, that they are endeavoring to promote their own commercial welfare by so ambitious a project. As a representative from the city of New York, and expressing the attitude, I dare say, of the bulk of the plain people of the city, I would extend to my northwestern friends a message of Godspeed in their effort to extend their commerce, if they may, by the deepening of their harbors, by cutting, if they can, through the St. Lawrence River, and extending that as a river highway so as to bring them in touch with the entire world. New York City is not hostile to the proposition.

And that, gentlemen, is a phase of the matter I propose particularly to emphasize. We have no jealousy of our northwestern neighbors. We are proud to see them develop, to increase in population, and to behold their industries and their commerce grow. But—for there is a "but" in our attitude—let us compare the efforts of our western friends in their struggle for betterment with the methods of our sturdy ancestors in the early days of New York City. It is true we have a natural harbor, one of great depth and breadth sufficient to hold and handle the fleets and commerce of all the world. But that alone was not sufficient. Happily we had men of vision who saw how their city could be made to increase in population and in power by opening up a waterway to the great West. By the magic of their skill and enterprise they transmuted their dreams into realities. They did not heckle their sister States nor strive to put their burden on the Federal Government. They had faith in their own visions and in their own power and in the resources of their own State.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CHALMERS] compares the building of the Champlain Canal into Canada with his pet project and remarks quite naively:

> It is right, proper, and patriotic for New York to build a canal into foreign territory, but it is wrong, wicked, and high treason for the West to connect up the Great Lakes with the St. Lawrence River.

Not at all, my good friend; just pay the bill without squirming, as New York did, and you can build a canal to Mexico.

The people of the State of New York built the Erie Canal at their own expense, and, you must admit, it was a mighty good investment——

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. In a moment. For out of that farseeing investment came commerce and industry, making the city of New York the greatest commercial emporium of all the world.

Mr. DUNBAR. Can the gentleman state how much the Erie Canal cost the State of New York?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Seven and one-half million dollars was the first outlay.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. ROSE. I had the pleasure of traveling over the Barge Canal from one end of it to the other, and——

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes; I remember I was with the gentleman on that recent trip.

Mr. ROSE. After the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CHALMERS] has so ably presented the case from his point of view, is it the opinion of the gentleman from New York that the construction of the St. Lawrence canal would sound the death warrant of the Barge Canal?

Mr. GRIFFIN. No; I do not think so. I think the Barge Canal is able to compete with any other waterway that can be devised by the ingenuity of man. There is too much ignorance upon that subject. I confess myself to have been ignorant of the magnitude and the possibilities of the Barge Canal. A native New Yorker, going upon that recent trip, to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROSE] has just referred, I confess that I was amazed at its magnitude and I was also dismayed at the revelation of how utterly it has been neglected by the shippers of the country.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNBAR] asked how much the Erie Canal originally cost. It was $7,500,000. But since it was opened by Gov. Clinton, the State of New York has paid for its maintenance and upkeep; it has never demanded a single appropriation from the United States Government for those purposes. Within the last 10 years it has expended $165,000,000 in extensions and enlargements, making it not only a modern canal but a magnificent waterway. Great dams and locks have been built. The water levels have been raised and the rivers of the State have been turned into a great highway. Instead of being a mere canal held in by artificial banks, it consists of the Hudson River, the Mohawk River, and the Oswego River, so that in its entire length there are only 42 miles which are held in by artificial banks. It is practically an enlargement of the rivers and the lakes of the State, and is capable of carrying the commerce of the State of New York and of all the Western States for many years to come.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I do.

Mr. DUNBAR. Did I understand the gentleman to state that the State of New York has in the last several years spent $165,000,000 in improvements to the canal?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes, sir. We have built a new waterway practically.

Mr. DUNBAR. Can the gentleman tell us what would be the total expense of that canal to-day? I asked the gentleman a while ago, and he stated that the original cost was $7,500,000.

Mr. GRIFFIN. No; I am unable to give the precise figures. Perhaps my friend from New York [Mr. TEN EYCK] can give the gentleman the exact figures.

Mr. TEN EYCK. The total expenditure on the Erie Canal plus the expenditure on the Barge Canal to date approximates $225,000,000, without any assistance from the other States of the Union or the Federal Government.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes. And in that connection, Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that I am without my material and the data which I have collected on the subject, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. CABLE. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York whether the New York Barge Canal pays or not? Is it a paying proposition?

Mr. GRIFFIN. No, my friend; the New York canal does not pay. And thereby hangs a tale. No canal in the United States of America pays to-day. There was an old saying that there were four reasons against the parcel post. They were the American Express Co., the United States Express Co., the Adams Express Co., and Westcott's Express Co. Now, there are 400 reasons why the canals in the United States do not pay, and if you take a list of the railroads of the United States you will find those reasons in detail. It is the opposition of the railroads. Why, the railroads have bought canals all over the country only to abandon them. Once acquired, they have allowed the green sedge to choke their course and the water to stagnate within their banks. They have persistently struggled to eliminate or destroy all waterway rivalry. I urge my friends of the Northwest to give the Barge Canal a trial.

I am, in fact, less disappointed with them than I am with the people of my own State. The merchants' associations and the boards of trade should urge the people of the State of New York to give the Barge Canal a trial. They should make it known that it is not a canal any longer, but a free waterway, foolishly neglected by those who might profit most by its use. I would like to see the day come when that beautiful water highway, with its capacious locks and splendid terminals, might be used to its fullest capacity.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Is not one reason why the New York Barge Canal is not more in use to-day the fact that the charges for loading and transferring in New York City are from 4 to 5 cents a bushel on grain, and that there is a delay there of 4 to 6 days in securing the transfer of grains and other commodities from cars or barges to ocean-going vessels, while in Montreal the delay is not over 24 hours and the cost is only 1 cent per bushel for transfer? The fact is that Montreal has during the last few years largely displaced New York as the grain market for the Western Continent, due to its better terminal facilities and cheaper rates for handling and transferring freight.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I am glad the gentleman has made that statement, because that is a sample of the propaganda that has been widely circulated in order to prejudice the country against the Barge Canal. I saw a scurrilous editorial in a Michigan paper——

Mr. STAFFORD. That is right. Swear it on Wisconsin——

Mr. GRIFFIN. That paper is the Superior Telegram, of Wisconsin, and it emphasized the statement made by my friend from South Dakota. Only its language was not quite so decorous as his. This is part of the editorial which appeared in its issue of October 25, 1921. You will notice that its language is neither chaste nor charitable:

[From the Superior Telegram (Wisconsin), Oct. 25, 1921.]

At the Duluth conference yesterday C. A. Lamoreaux, of Ashland, chairman of the Wisconsin tidewater commission, said:

"The West is now required to pay $65 a car for transfer of freight from a car to a boat in New York, while the same service costs $3.50 at Montreal."

More than eighteen times as much is paid for the transfer of a car of freight for export in New York as in Montreal. The New York steal is no modest affair. The condition in New York is absolutely rotten, and probably beyond reasonable hope of reform in the present generation. At last the mighty West, and nearly the whole country, has risen in righteous rebellion against this extortion and robbery, and thieving old New York will not only be defeated in its effort to perpetuate the thievery but it may get its nose rubbed strongly into its own filth. It is a big city, but not big enough to forever bluff the whole country. The deep waterway will be pushed to completion and new and better days will come for the whole interior of the continent.

It is regrettable that any sheet calling itself a newspaper and making a pretense of guiding public opinion should be guilty of such intemperance. You can hardly expect to build up good fellowship in our great Federal Union by inciting hate and mistrust among the States.

The plain people of New York are very much like the plain people of other States. New York is far, indeed, from being wicked. It is often the hiding place of little criminals and the "show-off" place of big criminals, but both alike are birds of passage. The money elements that come to New York City to exploit you, exploit us. The only difference, if any, is to your advantage. They are nearer to us than to you and we feel first and, perhaps, hardest the effects of their villainy.

But apart from that our western friends have no grievance as to the matters so strongly stated in the Wisconsin editor's philippic. It does not cost $65 per car at New York City for the transfer of freight from car to boat. That statement is pure invention to furnish an excuse for editorial vituperation.

Our friend from South Dakota [Mr. WILLIAMSON] asks if it is not true that the rate for handling grain at New York is between 4 and 5 cents a bushel. It is not. The present price is 1 cent per bushel. Furthermore, the State of New York has recently completed a grain elevator at the port of New York to meet the Montreal competition, and I am creditably informed that it is proposed to reduce that rate to one-half cent a bushel. There is the Barge Canal at the disposal of the people of the country without a cent of expense except the mere cost of handling the grain at the end of the journey, which, as I stated, is 1 cent per bushel.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Is it not a fact that this year is the first year since the completion of the Barge Canal that it has been thrown open to the public for them to operate and use?

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is correct.

Mr. TEN EYCK. And is it not a fact this is the first year that boats have been put upon it which are owned and operated by private corporations and the general public, as well as individuals, on account of the Federal Government having taken over its entire control and operation?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Heretofore the Government, since its completion a year or two ago, has controlled it up until this spring.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes; I am glad the gentleman brought that to your attention also, because when the Barge Canal was completed we were in the midst of war and the Government immediately took possession of the canal and of all the boats that were operating upon it, and then, strange to say, instead of using the canal and the vessels which were thus acquired in order to transport grain, material, and supplies, the Government either tied the boats up or made such exorbitant rates that it was impossible for the shippers of the country to use them. Within the past year the Barge Canal has been turned back to the people of the State, the boats have been sold, and they have been purchased by private individuals or corporations. Barges are now being built 300 feet long, with a capacity of 2,000 to 2,500 tons, and there is a prospect now that the Barge Canal will be used to its full capacity.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ROSE. I was attracted by the question of the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. WILLIAMSON] complaining about the Barge Canal not being at the present time a paying proposition, and I thought the Members of the House ought to have some knowledge which was obtained by those of us who were on the Barge Canal trip as to the reasons given for the failure of the Barge Canal up to the present time to be self-sustaining. It is true that the Government took it over in the time of war and gave it back to private control only within the past year. Now, we found that during the entire year only 2,000,000 tons of freight were transported over that canal, whereas it is capable of transporting 20,000,000 tons.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes; 25,000,000 tons.

Mr. ROSE. It is capable of transporting 20,000,000 to 25,000,000 tons a year. Now, while I am in favor of building waterways everywhere to help this country and to help the farmers of the West, I do not believe the people of New York are antagonistic to the construction of the St. Lawrence canal project, but I do believe they are fearful that the $200,000,000 that they have already expended may be jeopardized by the building of such a canal. I came to the conclusion myself that it is the fault of the people of New York themselves that the present barge canal is not a paying proposition for the reason that they have not yet got to thinking of the barge canal when they are ready to ship their ore and coal and other heavy freight from one city to another. I believe that there are sufficient people along that canal engaged in the active work of transportation of goods and merchandise so that that canal would amply pay provided they would use the facilities right at the door of the people of the State of New York.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I should like 10 minutes more.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I want to make it as clear as I can that New York has nothing to fear from the encouragement of the St. Lawrence project. If any zealot nourishes the bitter hope in his heart—or in his liver—that the completion of that project is going to injure the city of New York, let him cease at once to take comfort from his illusion. It will not hurt New York; but it will doubtless delay and obstruct the river and harbor improvement of every other ambitious Atlantic port and thwart for many years to come the hopes of the Gulf and Pacific ports.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROSE] has put his finger precisely on the seat of the trouble. The people of New York are their own worst enemy. They do not seem to know how to use the wonderful engineering achievement their own money and industry have consummated. Last year it was utilized only to 8 per cent of its capacity. It would seem as though they are waiting for our western friends to use it, and our western friends, equally oblivious of their opportunities, are wasting their time and energy in the pursuit of the St. Lawrence mirage—a mere ignis fatuus.

If the Barge Canal is not used, New York City will hardly feel or notice the difference in shipping activity. During the war it was practically closed down completely; yet the commerce of New York went on without the slightest apparent diminution.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Is it not a fact that the State of New York does not charge anything for the use of the Barge Canal?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Certainly that is a fact.

Mr. TEN EYCK. It is free of toll to the entire country.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I suppose it is generally known that the Barge Canal is free of tolls—thrown right open to the use of the commerce and industry of the country. The State of New York makes no profit from its use.

I do not fear that the building of the St. Lawrence canal, if it is ever consummated, will interfere with the usability of the Barge Canal. I would welcome the growth of population, industry, and commerce of our Northwestern States that would make the Barge Canal inadequate.

I cherish the thought that some time in the future the Barge Canal will be inadequate; but until it is inadequate it is rather too soon to talk of thrusting the tremendous burden upon the people of this country of contributing to the building of a canal, the greater portion of which lies in foreign territory. I would ask my friends of the Northwest to emulate the spirit and the enterprise of the State of New York which, when it needed waterways, built them. There is no objection to those Western States, whose legislatures have indorsed the foreign project, appropriating so much money per State in order to contribute to the building of the St. Lawrence Canal. They ought to do it if they think it is going to help them. I would urge them to do it, because I am satisfied it is going to repay them a hundred fold. But it is not good taste and it is not patriotic to come to Congress and ask the people of the United States to contribute to or back up this St. Lawrence project. First of all, in my opinion, Canada herself should build this waterway, or so much of it as lies within her boundaries. Let her enlarge and deepen the St. Lawrence River, say, to Lake Ontario. Then, when she has opened a navigable waterway to that point, let the northwestern States, whose ports may need a further development of the project, contribute, if they will, or if they wish, to the enterprise. Then, when the main artery of the waterway is open, the time will be ripe for them to come to Congress for appropriations to connect their ports with something that is tangible.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman explain how the several States are to cooperate with a foreign Government in the building of a canal on foreign territory?

Mr. GRIFFIN. The gentleman loses the point of my remark. Appropriating money for the canal is an entirely different proposition from its allocation. They can appropriate the money for their share of the project. There is nothing to prevent them from doing that if they are in earnest. The National Government will doubtless find a way to attend to the allocation of it in cooperation with the foreign Government, if they see fit. But the time is not ripe yet for Federal intervention. If we were to undertake this plan now before the Barge Canal has been used to its limit, neither could possibly prosper.

But if you insist on appropriations from the United States Government, why burden our people with taxation in order to help Canada in an enterprise whose ultimate effectuality is conjectural? The vast amount of money which is called for in this enterprise ought to be used in the improvement of the rivers and harbors of not only the Lake region, but of the Atlantic, the Gulf, and the Pacific coasts, and the great waterways of our country. I am somewhat of an altruist, but I believe that altruism, like charity, should begin at home.

This whole question of entering into an agreement with a foreign nation for the purpose of building a commercial waterway on foreign territory is a dangerous proposition. It is altruism gone wild. It does not alone mean the initial appropriation, but we will inevitably be confronted, year after year, with appeals for additional money in order to deepen the channels and contiguous ports which will be the feeders and termini of the project.

How many western cities which have been mentioned here to-day on this floor have an adequate depth of water to float the ships which this enterprise contemplates? Remember they have in mind the building of seagoing ships capable of navigating the high seas, capable of going through rivers and canals, and drawing a depth of 25 and 30 feet. How many Representatives from districts which have these western ports can hold up their hands and say that they have that depth of water? Not one. It means that for years and years to come we are going to be asked to make appropriations for the purpose of dredging and other improvements. But if you build the St. Lawrence canal yourselves, I say more power to you, and when that time comes I shall be willing to grant appropriations for deepening your harbors; but as the matter stands to-day it does not seem to be good policy for the United States to enter into any combination with a foreign power to help it build its waterways so long as the waterways in our own country—on our Atlantic, Pacific, and Gulf ports—are so sorely in need of development.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York yields back three minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL].

Mr. CRISP. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of Members interested that things vital to a vast number of our people, vital to the future of this country are weighed in the balance in room 704, Department of Commerce Building. The hearings began on November 28 and are to continue till the night of the 7th of December. On August 9, when the conference report on the packer control bill was before us, I called the attention of the House to the fact that the Attorney General's office was considering modifying the packers' consent decree. There was the greatest secrecy surrounding that projected modification. Prior to August 9 I had called the office of the Assistant Attorney General for further light on this matter, and all the response I could get for definite facts was a very lively interest as to how I got my information. The matter was being kept under cover from the very people most vitally concerned. Congress was not to know a thing about it. I could only squeeze out the admission that live-stock questions were not to be opened up. As to what articles were to be modified, not a word.

Through newspaper reports of my statement, the country's attention was awakened, and inquiry of the Attorney General's office revealed that such was contemplated. Those opposed to its change insisted upon a hearing and demanded to know upon what information such changes were to be based.

So far the testimony for the change is supported by only two concerns—the California Cooperative Canning Association and the National Sauer Kraut Co. The Canning Association, represented by Vernon Campbell, is estimated, allowing for its highest value, at $56,000. Campbell admitted that Armour & Co. held a mortgage upon this plant for $250,000. In California, where this plant is located, it is commonly known as the Armour plant. Fifty-one per cent of the stock of the sauer-kraut concern is owned by Armour & Co. Thus early it can be seen that the source of this propaganda for the change of the consent decree, represented to issue from the demand of the growers and canners, can be immediately traced back to the desire of the packers to avoid the agreement which they made to escape the penalty of the law. And now that the packers' control bill is a law, and by it the Federal Trade Commission and its incriminating evidence against the packers eliminated, the packers are seeking to destroy the consent decree around which the control bill was framed.

Congress in passing this so-called packer control act relied on the fact of the consent decree. That bill was as completely interwoven with the consent decree as the treaty of Versailles with the League of Notions. [Laughter.] To destroy the decree was to nullify the act, for time and again when Members wished to add or amend or interpolate, committee members, all in good faith, I believe, would rejoin, "Oh, that is all taken care of by the consent decree."

Hearings on the packer control bill were held in July. The consent decree was agreed to February 27, 1920. After the consent decree, hearings continued before House and Senate. The conference report on the packers control bill passed the House August 9, 1921. In the conference committee bill were provisions which prohibited the packers from running stockyards and stock papers. This was knocked out of the bill because the packers had signed the consent decree. No mention was even made of it in the later bill. The decree was assumed to cover this and many other cases. If the decree is modified, we shall have to take up the packer bill and go the whole weary road over again, because the Secretary of Agriculture, under that bill, has no control over the unrelated products. The recent decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission on the rate case was based on the existence of the consent decree. The question is continually suggested in these hearings by the Assistant Attorney General, "What wrongful act do you know of, committed by the packers in these unrelated industries?"

That is not the question. This is a question of whether we want a Government based on monopoly or a system of government based on competition. The question is, Is it American for this or any monopoly to be allowed to retain special privileges and be given further opportunities over the one thing which concerns the people's life, namely, food? We should all be for a competitive system. If we do not stop this thing now, it will not be very long—seven years at their present rate of turnover—until the packers control the whole food business of the United States.

This is certainly of vital interest to Congress, and if this decree is modified Congress should pass a resolution to have laid before it the evidence and testimony on which that decision was rendered. [Applause.]

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an article from the New York City Journal of Commerce.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the New York City Journal of Commerce, Sept. 8, 1921.]

"MEAT TRUST" WOULD RULE IN FIVE YEARS—PREDICTED RESULT OF ATTORNEY GENERAL DAUGHERTY'S PLAN.

"Set aside this consent decree and give the 'big five' packers carte blanche to can, manufacture, wholesale, and retail all food products, and I predict that within five years the big five will dominate the entire food supply of the Nation in the same sense that they now dominate the meat supply—completely," declared Arthur P. Williams of R. C. Williams & Co. yesterday to a reporter of the Journal of Commerce. "In an additional five years I predict that the few surviving independent canners, food manufacturers, wholesale and retail grocers will live only with the consent of the big five."

"That is a serious prophecy," continued Mr. Williams, "but I know what chance the independent business firm operating competitively in one market has to survive the far-flung organizations maintained by the big five. Their resources are without limit. The expedited service they get from the packer-owned refrigerator cars, the low car minima and freight rates are too much for any ordinary canner or merchant to overcome.

"The trade has been stunned by the secrecy and the unusual dispatch with which the Department of Justice has proceeded in this matter.

"Why all the secrecy and the haste? The matter only came to the attention of the public by tracing a charge made upon the floor of the House of Representatives by Representative SCHALL, of Minnesota, who is reported to have accused the Attorney General of having decided to set aside the consent decree and claimed he was only holding up the announcement pending the passage by both Houses of the toothless packer control bill.

"Upon investigation the trade learned for the first time that the Attorney General had had the matter under advisement apparently for some time."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

House concurrent resolution 32.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Tuesday, the 6th day of December, 1921, at 12.30 o'clock in the afternoon, for the purpose of receiving such communications as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them.

GENERAL DEBATE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOWREY].

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I am not sure but that some gentlemen from the East may have gotten the idea that the farmer of the South and the West is in a rather complaining mood, inclined to make unnecessary and unreasonable demands and complaints. Sometimes I am not sure but that they are inclined to answer us as the Negro answered the catfish in his hand. He said, "What do you want to keep flopping and flirting around that way for? I ain't goin' to do nothin' to you but split you open."

I have before me a letter received to-day on a matter that is somewhat akin at least to the subject now under discussion, and it has seemed to me that this is a good place to bring it in. Perhaps the prominent characteristic of what I have to say will be that it is not on the subject, but that is not uncommon in the American Congress anyway.

I have here a letter from Mr. Wilson, who is the head of the agricultural extension work of my own State, in which it seems to me he makes some pertinent remarks, and I think those remarks ought to be gotten before this House. I hope they will come in more directly later when we have legislation under consideration to which they will more directly apply. The letter is as follows:

COOPERATIVE EXTENSION WORK IN AGRICULTURE AND HOME ECONOMICS,
STATE OF MISSISSIPPI.
AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, MISS., December 1, 1921.

Representative B. G. LOWREY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. LOWREY: There is a great deal of discussion now as to why farming is not more profitable. It is a fact that farmers here in Mississippi are as a rule in serious financial straits. I know numerous individual farmers who after their operating expenses for this year are paid will be unable to pay their taxes. This applies to the land-owning class and not to tenants.

Of course, it may be said to be in a sense their fault, as they practiced a faulty system and imperfect methods, but even those who practiced fairly progressive and businesslike methods have realized little from their efforts, due to the fact that many of their products are being sold for little more, and in some cases less, than actual cost of production.

The question of markets is a complicated and difficult one that can not be solved quickly, but through the combined efforts of the Government, State extension forces, and organizations of the farmers themselves much progress is being made, and I believe that this problem will in a measure be worked out, at least in as far as conditions will permit.

But the thing that is doing more to throttle production in the South and drive farmers away from the land than any other one thing at this time is the exorbitant and discriminating freight rate on farm products.

I say this with no prejudice against the railroads. I would not for anything do them an injustice, as I realize the disastrous effect upon development that would follow were the railroads permanently crippled. Were the present rates necessary to tide the railroads over the present crisis, I think we would even be inclined to bear it temporarily. At least the radically different rates charged for farm products in the South as compared to other sections leads us to believe that they are not necessary, and it is against this apparently unwarranted discrimination that we complain, and I am appealing to you to see if any relief is possible, as we have appealed to the railroads in vain.

For instance, we have this year in Mississippi a surplus of corn. You will find by investigation that the rate on corn for, say, 100 miles in Mississippi is practically twice that for the same distance on the same line in Illinois.

Further than this, every station in Illinois that handles corn has a reshipping and milling-in transit rate, by which freight into a town of any size is practically absorbed when any product is reshipped.

Another tremendous injustice in the South is the absence of a through rate. As a concrete illustration of this a prominent shipper at Meridian, Miss., a few months ago shipped a carload of peas from Gatman, Miss., to Union City, Tenn. He was charged two rates, a rate from Gatman, Miss., to Tupelo, Miss., over the Frisco, and a rate from Tupelo, Miss., to Union City, Tenn., over the Mobile & Ohio. The combination rate was 48 cents per hundredweight. There was a through rate in effect from Gatman, Miss., to St. Louis, Mo., of 32 cents per hundredweight. The effect of this combination rate is that the railroad received 50 per cent more revenue than from hauling twice the distance where through rates were established.

The rate on export corn from St. Louis to New Orleans is 18½ cents. There is absorbed in this rate two bridge tolls of not less than 5 cents per hundredweight. Out of the 18½-cent rate the railroad company pays a toll of not less than 2½ cents to the bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis and the one across the Ohio at Cairo. The domestic rate on corn from St. Louis to New Orleans is 22½ cents, which also includes the two bridge tolls. The rate on corn, both domestic use and for export from practically all north Mississippi stations on the Mobile & Ohio Railroad and, I think, on the other roads to New Orleans, is 20½ cents. Out of this the railroads have no tolls of any sort to pay. It is all freight.

A short time ago a car of cattle was shipped from Starkville, Miss., to St. Louis, Mo. They were reasonably good; what is known as grass-fat cattle. After the freight and commissions were paid the producers received $1.90 per hundredweight for their cattle. In other words, a cow weighing 500 pounds, brought the owner $9.50. Is it any wonder that our people are discouraged and that it is extremely difficult to get farmers of Mississippi to diversify their crops? I do not know that anything can be done to relieve the situation, but there is nothing that would do more to encourage diversification and agricultural development, so much needed in Mississippi, as at least an equitable freight rate on products other than cotton.

Yours, very truly,

R. S. WILSON,
Director of Extension.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I rise to speak on a bill I have to-day introduced providing for Federal local option under the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution. The amendment prohibits, for beverage purposes the manufacture, sale, or transportation of "intoxicating liquors." Ever since the ratification of this amendment the American people have been trying to find out what are "intoxicating liquors." The Supreme Court has decided that the duty of definition of these two words rests with the Congress of the United States.

Before the amendment, wine and beer were not popularly considered as "intoxicating liquors." They are not so considered to-day in many important parts of the United States. The bootleg whisky and home-made "hootch" that have taken the place of the former mild wine and beer have always been popularly considered the most conspicuous of the class of "spirits" known as liquor, as distinguished from wine or beer.

Before the amendment, the States exercised the American principle of local option in regard to the use of liquor, wine, or beer. By the amendment the manufacture, sale, or transportation of liquor is prohibited, but Congress may itself, under the decisions of the Supreme Court, say that wine or beer were not by that amendment classed as "intoxicating liquors."

The Federal Government itself has assumed exclusive control of the matter of alcoholic beverages. The Supreme Court, in effect, has decided that the "concurrent" power of the States is meaningless. It is therefore proper that the Federal Government should itself put into effect local option as to wine and beer.

The bill I to-day introduced is as follows:

A bill to reduce and equalize taxation, to create Federal local-option districts, to amend the revenue act of 1921, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the revenue act of 1921, Title VI, "Tax on beverages and constituent parts thereof," is hereby amended by the addition of the following section:

SEC. 604. (a) That from and after January 1, 1922, each of the congressional districts from which a Member of the House of Representatives is chosen shall constitute a Federal local-option district.

(b) That in the election to be held for choosing such Members of the House of Representatives in November, 1922, the electors of each of such Federal local-option districts shall decide by vote whether there shall be manufactured, sold, or transported in such district beer or wine, or both, as hereinafter defined.

(c) The word "wine" means any alcoholic beverage obtained by the fermentation of the natural sugar content of fruits—grapes, apples, etc.—or other agricultural products containing sugar—honey, milk, etc.—containing not more than 12 per cent of alcohol by volume.

The word "beer" means any beverage obtained by the alcoholic fermentation of an infusion or decoction of barley, malt, and hops in drinkable water, containing not more than 4 per cent of alcohol by volume.

(d) That if in any such Federal local option district the majority of the said electors shall vote "for beer" or "for wine," or for both, that thereafter in such Federal local option district such beer or wine is hereby defined not to be an intoxicating liquor, the manufacture, sale, or transportation of which in said district is prohibited by the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, but that thereafter said beer or wine or both may be manufactured, sold, or transported for sale in original packages for consumption only in homes and in bona fide hotels and clubs.

(e) That there shall be levied, assessed, or collected on all beer so manufactured a tax of 20 cents per gallon and on all wine so manufactured a tax of 40 cents per gallon.

(f) All legislation inconsistent herewith is hereby repealed.

The adoption of Federal local option will deal with the alcoholic beverage question in the American way. It will allay the present unrest, stop the widespread violation of law, and also produce millions of dollars annually of much-needed Federal revenue.

Prewar beer was about 4 per cent beer. Claret, according to the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, contains an average volume per cent of alcohol of 10.30, white southern Italian wine is 10.28, Ohio red wine 10.63, and sweet champagne 10.30. Nature has placed beer and wine in a different class from distilled spirits. American whisky, bottled in bond, according to the Treasury Department, averages 50 per cent by volume, while gin averages 48 per cent.

Congress can well follow the example of nature, and by the power of definition sanctioned by the Supreme Court place beer and wine outside of the liquor prohibition in those local-option units of the Federal Government which so desire. Those Federal local-option districts which do not want wine or beer by this bill are allowed to retain their freedom of choice, while those communities that desire beer or wine may legally have either or both. This is the American principle, and, believe me, gentlemen, this is the principle that you will ultimately adopt. The abuse of the saloon is barred forever, but the liberty of the American home should be restored.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. A. P. NELSON].

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, on March 19, 1920, I addressed the House at some length upon the subject of the St. Lawrence route through the Great Lakes to the sea. Since that time a great deal of sentiment, both pro and con, has developed in this country concerning this great enterprise, designed to open up the interior of our great country and to aid and enhance the production and transportation facilities of our Nation. A great many of the objections raised by the opponents of this route, I think, are untenable, mythical, and imaginative.

I rise to address the House to-day for the purpose of answering some of the objections which have been raised to what I consider one of the most important and meritorious projects of the twentieth century. May I be permitted at the very outset to say that the proponents of this great highway to the sea have no quarrel whatsoever with the good people of New York concerning the great Barge Canal. It is not our purpose in any way to interfere, infringe on, or destroy the possibilities of the barge canal. New York is to be congratulated upon her great courage in going ahead, single-handed as a State, to develop this splendid enterprise. But we are convinced that the barge canal of New York does not and can not furnish the adequate outlet for the Middle West and Northwest to the sea and foreign ports. We contend that the great West, in the midst of which is situated the American Mediterranean, should not have this great inland sea bottled up and compelled to carry its ever-increasing commerce through the restricted conditions of the barge canal and the congested terminals at the port of New York. Moreover, the barge canal, with a capacity of only 10,000,000 tons a year each way, is not sufficient to take care of the peak loads from the Great Lakes area. Only the open waterway from the Great Lakes to the sea by way of the St. Lawrence can adequately furnish the inland States a proper outlet for their growing agricultural, industrial, and commercial life. [Applause.]

There is no question that the greatest and most important problem in the economy of our national life to-day is the problem of adequate transportation at reasonable cost both to the producer and the consumer, and the contention of the 18 States, members of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Tidewater Association, is that this great inland sea shall no longer continue bottled up, but be unbottled and utilized for the benefit of the interior States of the Nation, and that no one State or seaport should by mere local or selfish interest stand in the way of its development for the interest of the entire Nation.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to seem discourteous, but I must decline to yield at this time.

The St. Lawrence ship channel is not a competitive route to the New York Barge Canal. It can not be made a competitive route to this canal. The St. Lawrence route is a cooperative route between the East and the West, and it is my contention that the continued neglect to improve this waterway from the interior to the sea is nothing short of a national economic crime, and when New York and its estimable governor talk provincially of the barge canal as the ship channel to the sea as satisfying the needs and demands of the great Middle West it is, as Mr. Gillam, of Omaha, said, "like trying to feed a starving giant through a straw."

Mr. Chairman, in behalf of the State of Wisconsin and of the entire Northwest, I wish to call the attention of Congress to the economic problems which now confront the producers and manufacturers of that region. In that territory to which I allude is produced the larger proportion of the surplus food products entering into our foreign trade. We produce 75 per cent of the wheat, 65 per cent of the corn, 100 per cent of the flax, 85 per cent of the iron, 35 per cent of the copper, 34 per cent of the zinc, and 46 per cent of the lead of the entire country. By reason of the availability of the vast stores of raw materials, we have been able to establish upon the shores of the Great Lakes and at other favorable locations industries producing annually billions of dollars' worth of manufactured goods. In connection with these manufacturers we import vast quantities of raw material from foreign lands, and in our domestic life we consume about 40 per cent of the food and manufactured products imported into the country from other nations. Situated, as we are, 1,000 to 1,500 miles from the ocean, we are compelled to pay transportation costs amounting in the aggregate to many millions of dollars annually in excess of the costs which are paid by producers and consumers located along the seaboard. In view of our important contribution to the commerce of the country and of the heavy transportation taxes which we are compelled to bear, we feel that we have a right to demand from the National Government adequate action designed to foster and protect the development of our commerce and to advance our interests in world trade.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, I would prefer to continue without interruption.

Mr. LAYTON. Just for a short question.

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Very well, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. LAYTON. Is the gentleman in favor of ship subsidy?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, I am not discussing that question now. I shall be glad to state my views on that question when we reach it.

INADEQUACY OF PRESENT TRANSPORTATION FACILITIES.

The United States has never had a transportation system devised in the interests of the people as a whole and coordinating our rail and water facilities. In the early history of the country ports were established along the Atlantic coast and rail lines were extended westward to meet the movement of the center of population and to obtain greater business for the railroads themselves. Eventually the transcontinental routes were constructed, providing us with rail transportation from sea to sea. As a result the direction of traffic has always been largely east and west. Later we built the Panama Canal, and although this canal involves the passage of several locks, overcoming a total elevation of 85 feet, and the tolls have amounted approximately to $1 per cargo ton, the economies of the route as compared with transcontinental lines have resulted in marked diversions of traffic to the water route, and lately the transcontinental lines have been obliged to make important reductions in freight rates with a view of meeting in some measure the competition of the water route. As it is, the rates by water are in many cases less than half the rates by rail, although the distance is twice as far, approximately. The benefits of the Panama Canal extend from the Atlantic coast westward as far as Indiana, from the Pacific coast eastward as far as the Rockies, and from the Gulf coast northward as far as St. Louis, leaving the great north central and western area of the country at a disadvantage in respect to both foreign and domestic trade and imposing restrictions in commercial intercourse which are unfair to those sections and injurious to the entire country. [Applause.]

In the last few years the United States has been placed in a particularly favorable position for gaining markets throughout the world which were formerly controlled largely by other countries, and as a result we have developed a vast trade for manufactured goods in South America and the Orient. The return of peace has brought with it a resumption of the keen competition for world trade that formerly existed among nations. American goods are popular, but American deliveries are notoriously uncertain because of the frequent congestion in transportation and of delays at the terminals. Distances to seaboard from industrial centers of England, Germany, Holland, Belgium, and other countries competing with us in manufacturing are from one-fourth to one-tenth the distance to seaboard from the industrial centers of the Great Lakes. In addition to this handicap, production costs in many lines are higher than abroad. Rail class rates between Chicago and New York on exports in cents per hundred pounds are 157½ first class, 138½ second class, 105 third class, 73½ fourth class, 63 fifth class, and 52½ sixth class. Between St. Louis and New York they are 184½, 162, 123, 86, 73½, and 61½, respectively; while between St. Paul and New York they are 216½, 188½, 143½, 100, 86½, and 72, respectively. On first-class freight these rates are equivalent to $31.50 a ton from Chicago, $36.80 a ton from St. Louis, and $43.30 a ton from St. Paul, the distances being 912, 1,065, and 1,322 miles, respectively. From New York to Australian ports the rates range from $15 a ton for unpacked freight to $30 a ton for fine cargo. The rate is less from New York to Australia, 13,000 miles distant, than from New York to Chicago, 900 miles distant. Adding the terminal cost at the seaboard, it is very much more expensive to place high-class goods from the West on board vessel at New York than to transport them by ship to any part of the world. Our foreign competitors located on or close to the seaboard can place their goods on our shores at less cost than can the manufacturers of our interior.

But the cost of the movement to seaboard is not the only consideration. The commerce of the country at this moment does not seriously tax the railroads because we are passing through a period of business depression. The normal traffic of the country now exceeds the present car capacity by approximately 50,000,000,000 ton-miles annually, and it has been estimated by railroad authorities that over 700,000 cars are required to make up the present shortage, to retire worn-out cars, and to take care of normal increases of traffic, and an adequate surplus to handle the peak loads.

COST OF INCREASING RAILROAD FACILITIES TO MEET NORMAL TRAFFIC REQUIREMENTS IS PROHIBITIVE.

The cost of these cars would alone amount approximately to $2,000,000,000, nor is any improvement in the situation being made. On October 15, 1921, there were 374,431 cars in bad condition, and on July 1, 1921, there were in existence 27,048 fewer cars than on July 1, 1920. No new lines nor extensions are being constructed, and there has been a steady decrease in the mileage of track in the eastern district where the congestion is the greatest. With the revival of business we face transportation congestions more serious than have ever occurred before. Railroad authorities have estimated that it would require from $15,000,000,000 to $18,000,000,000 to place the railroads of the country upon an efficient basis. No such amount of money can be provided, and we must therefore seek other means of meeting the transportation needs of the country. In order to reduce excessive cost of transportation from the producing and manufacturing centers of the interior, the West demands an outlet to the sea, and in making this demand we are seeking not alone the protection and preservation of the commerce of that section but the advancement of our country's position in world trade as well. [Applause.]

INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION.

The project for the opening of the Great Lakes to ocean vessels by way of the St. Lawrence River is now receiving consideration by the International Joint Commission under authority of the river and harbor act of March 2, 1919. The commission has held hearings in all parts of the country, including those sections in which opposition to the project has centered. The chief opposition to this project which the West is demanding in the interests of the country is found in some but not all sections of the State of New York. The cities of Buffalo and New York have expressed great concern regarding the expenditure of funds for the purpose of providing a route for the commerce of the West which does not pass their doors.

Notwithstanding the fact that incontrovertible evidence as to the economic necessity for this improvement has been presented at the hearings before the International Joint Commission, and in due time will be presented to this body, the governor of the State of New York has recently delivered a series of addresses in which he assails the project as visionary and assumes the task of presenting the alleged real facts to the people. His addresses are remarkable for the solicitude expressed for South Atlantic and Gulf ports whose traffic would be ruined if this so-called visionary scheme were carried out. He would lavish Federal expenditures upon all ports and waterways except those of the great interior which is in need of cheaper and more adequate transportation. This is, indeed, a new aspiration for the commercial interests of New York, which have heretofore been conspicuous in their efforts to control the business of the country.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. I prefer not to yield now.

BETTER DISTRIBUTION OF TRAFFIC NEEDED IN THE INTERESTS OF OUR PORTS AND THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The people of the West are in full accord with the principles enunciated by the governor of New York with respect to Federal improvement of navigation throughout the entire land; but we will go a step further and say that our interest should not be confined to making appropriations for improvement of rivers and harbors, but that other and more drastic remedies should be applied to effect a better distribution of commerce through the ports of the country, to the end that we may be freed, in part at least, from the tremendous burdens that have been placed upon our commerce by permitting the continuance of conditions which have forced the foreign business of the country largely through the "archaic" port of New York. We now have a large merchant marine and we must establish conditions which will enable the vessels of our commercial fleet to operate profitably not only at the port of New York but at every port of the country which constitutes a logical outlet for traffic. The great port of Norfolk, whose natural advantages are unsurpassed, has been a victim of our lack of a transportation policy devised in the interests of the country as a whole. Likewise the great ports of Boston, Charleston, Savannah, and Mobile, have been unable to take their true places as outlets for the territory logically tributary to them because of our remissness in permitting the powerful trunk lines centering at New York to control the situation. [Applause.] We have committed a monumental folly in permitting the assembling at one port of the shipping resources of a nation, and for this folly we are now bearing a burden amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars annually. Freight which should logically be shipped from Portland, Boston, Norfolk, Wilmington, Charleston, Savannah, Jacksonville, Tampa, and Mobile directly to foreign destination now proceeds by rail to New York, at great cost, because it can not obtain a ship to destination from the port which should receive the traffic. Are we to content ourselves with this situation or are we to begin now to unravel the tangles of our transportation situation and lay the foundation on which all of our important ports on the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts and on the Great Lakes may hope to perform their proper functions in the interests of the whole country?

Only in this way can we reduce the excessive rail hauls that now burden our traffic and handicap us in foreign trade, and only in this way can we bring about conditions which will enable our large merchant fleet to operate successfully. I want to repeat that the West favors the opening of all these outlets, and it invites the State of New York to join in this great movement to which Congress has committed itself by delegating to the Shipping Board, in section 8 of the merchant marine act, the following duties:

SEC. 8. That it shall be the duty of the board, in cooperation with the Secretary of War, with the object of promoting, encouraging, and developing ports and transportation facilities in connection with water commerce over which it has jurisdiction, to investigate territorial regions and zones tributary to such ports, taking into consideration the economies of transportation by rail, water, and highway and the natural direction of the flow of commerce; to investigate the causes of the congestion of commerce at ports and the remedies applicable thereto; to investigate the subject of water terminals, including the necessary docks, warehouses, apparatus, equipment, and appliances in connection therewith, with a view to devising and suggesting the types most appropriate for different locations and for the most expeditious and economical transfer or interchange of passengers or property between carriers by water and carriers by rail; to advise with communities regarding the appropriate location and plan of construction of wharves, piers, and water terminals; to investigate the practicability and advantages of harbor, river, and port improvements in connection with foreign and coastwise trade; and to investigate any other matter that may tend to promote and encourage the use by vessels of ports adequate to care for the freight which would naturally pass through such ports.

While the governor of New York brands as theorists all who favor the opening of the Great Lakes to ocean vessels, he fails in every case to give the names of any experts who support his views. Let us examine a few of these statements, and ignore the generalities and denunciations long enough to get an unbiased view of the real facts.

ERRONEOUS STATEMENTS BY GOV. MILLER REGARDING ARMY ENGINEERS.

Gov. Miller states that "every report heretofore by every Army engineer who has studied that or similar projects for a ship canal from the Lakes to the sea has been adverse." What are the facts? In 1900 the Board of Engineers on Deep Waterways made complete surveys of various all-American routes between the Great Lakes and the Atlantic Ocean and reported in favor of a ship canal. The president of the board was Col. C. W. Raymond, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, and no other survey for this purpose has since been made by Army engineers with the exception of the new survey recently made by the engineers representing the United States and Canada with a view to the provision of a ship channel in the St. Lawrence River between Lake Ontario and Montreal. In 1918 what is known as a preliminary examination was made of the St. Lawrence River from Lake Ontario to the boundary line, and the report was adverse for the very sensible reason that the proposed channel would be useless unless extended to Montreal, and there was no authority for the consideration of such an extension.

The governor, in referring to the project for the St. Lawrence improvement, further makes the astonishing statement that "No such work was ever carried on within the estimates, either preliminary or detailed," this statement being intended to prove that the work will cost very much more than the estimate made by the engineers. It is true that in the past the actual cost of many of our river and harbor improvements exceeded the estimates. Particularly has this been the case where appropriations have been made in small installments covering a long period of years. In these cases the increased cost has been due to increased prices of labor and material and to inefficient prosecution of the work due to the failure to supply funds as needed. For many years there has been a gradual increase in the cost of labor and material. Estimates based upon unit prices at the time of the survey obviously must be increased if, due to failure to provide funds to complete the work promptly, the unit prices have advanced. The large items of expense in the improvement of the St. Lawrence will be the construction of the locks and dams. The unit price of concrete used by the engineers is $12 per cubic yard. Since this estimate was made there has been a downward price tendency, and further recession in construction costs will certainly follow. In connection with the construction of the new Welland Canal now in progress by the Dominion of Canada a price of $9.50 per cubic yard is now being obtained. On what basis can it be contended that an estimate made at a time of abnormally high prices, due to the war, will have to be increased? Rather may we expect a saving in the cost as a logical result of the inevitable readjustment of price levels to more normal bases.

Even in the face of steadily advancing prices before the war, the Army engineers, contrary to the statement of the governor, have accomplished some remarkable savings in the prosecution of river and harbor improvements. In 1907 the project for the construction of a harbor at Cold Spring Inlet (Cape May), N. J., was adopted by Congress, the estimated cost being $1,311,000. It was completed in 1917 at a total cost of $879,274.62 plus $100,000 contributed by local interests. This improvement involved the construction of jetties and dredging. The improvement of Absecon Inlet, N. J., adopted in 1912, at an estimated cost of $270,000, was completed in 1916 at a total cost of $226,496.89. Many other cases might be cited to show that the statement of the governor is not in accord with the facts.

CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS CONTAINED IN REPORT OF THE GOVERNMENT ENGINEERS (WOOTEN AND BOWDEN) RE IMPROVEMENT OF ST. LAWRENCE RIVER FOR NAVIGATION AND POWER.

As a result of their investigation of the engineering features of the proposed ship channel from Lake Ontario to Montreal, the engineers representing the United States and Canada have submitted to the International Joint Commission their conclusions and recommendations, of which the following is a brief summary:

The physical conditions are favorable for improvements for navigation which will be permanent and will have very low upkeep costs. The improvement for navigation alone is feasible, but it will be more economical to coordinate navigation with water power, limiting the latter development, however, to the amount which can be readily marketed. The project proposed contemplates improvement for navigation alone where side canals and locks can most economically be used, and provision for power development in that part of the river where the construction of locks and dams offers the most feasible means of improving navigation.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry, but I can not yield now. I shall be glad to do so later if I have the time.

Mr. Chairman, it is proposed to improve the lower section from Montreal to Lake St. Louis by locks and side canals, the canal sections to be excavated to a depth of 25 feet with bottom widths varying from 220 to 450 feet, and that the locks be built for an eventual depth of 30 feet over the sills. The cost of improving this section is estimated at $55,783,000, and the annual cost of operation, maintenance, and depreciation at $350,000. The cost of providing 30 feet depth in this section would involve an additional cost estimated at $12,944,000. The plan contemplates no power development in this section, but when the development of power is required it can be made by a further expenditure of $83,797,000.

The improvement of the second division from Lake St. Louis to Lake St. Francis is proposed by the construction of a side canal from Melocheville to Hungry Bay. The estimated cost of the works to a depth of 25 feet, a minimum bottom width of 220 feet, with banks and bridges placed for a future widening to 400 feet, and with locks and other structures designed for a depth of 30 feet is $36,590,000, and the annual cost of operation, maintenance, and depreciation is $400,000. The estimated cost of deepening the canal in the future so as to afford a depth of 30 feet is $3,110,000. No power development is at present contemplated in this section, but the development of 1,560,000 horsepower is possible without interfering with the use of the navigation works at an estimated cost of $151,688,000.

The improvement of the third division from Lake St. Francis to the head of St. Regis Island is proposed by dredging a channel 450 feet wide and 25 feet deep at low water, at an estimated cost of $1,158,000, and an annual maintenance cost of $30,000. The additional cost to provide a depth of 30 feet is estimated at $662,000.

The improvement of the fourth division from the foot of St. Regis Island below Cornwall to Chimney Point, near Ogdensburg, is proposed to be accomplished by a dam at Long Sault Rapids and side canals with locks from the pool created by this dam to the junction with the river at Cornwall, and by a dam with side canal and lock at Ogden Island. The project recommended provides a depth of 30 feet in all lock structures, and a depth of 25 feet in channels, except where a greater depth is required to discharge water without excessive velocities. The estimated cost of this work, including the installation of hydraulic and electrical machinery for the development of about 1,464,000 horsepower, is $159,097,200, and the annual cost of operation, maintenance, and depreciation is estimated at $1,762,000, of which $1,457,000 is properly chargeable to the development of power. The estimated additional cost of securing 30 feet depth in the future is $1,270,180.

The improvement of the fifth division from Chimney Point to Lake Ontario will require the removal of certain shoals and the widening and straightening of the present channel at a total estimated cost of $100,000 and an annual cost for operation and maintenance of $20,000.

The total cost of the improvement from Montreal to Lake Ontario, as recommended to afford 25 feet at present, with such provisions that a 30-foot depth may be secured at a later date without interfering with the use of the waterway, is $252,728,000, and the estimated additional cost of increasing the navigable depth throughout the entire distance to 30 feet at a later date $17,986,180.

In view of the fact that the opponents of the St. Lawrence improvement are seeking to give the impression that the above estimates are inadequate, it may be stated that other estimates have recently been made for improving this part of the St. Lawrence River. A project by the New York & Ontario Power Co., which provides for an improvement for navigation and power, is estimated to cost $171,773,215, of which $55,529,467 is chargeable to navigation and $116,243,748 to power. Three projects have been suggested by the Hydroelectric Power Commission, of Ontario. Scheme A is estimated to cost $209,843,804, of which $68,147,612 pertains to navigation and $141,696,192 to power. This plan will develop 1,492,000 horsepower. Scheme B is estimated to cost $211,466,419, of which $57,373,907 pertains to navigation and $154,092,512 to power developing 1,600,000 horsepower. Scheme C is estimated to cost $214,881,524, of which $59,956,109 is for navigation and $154,925,415 for power. This plan will develop 1,635,000 horsepower.

In reference to the recommendation of the engineers in favor of a 25-foot channel in the St. Lawrence River, at a total cost of approximately $252,000,000, with an additional expenditure of $17,000,000, to so construct the permanent works as to admit of enlargement to 30 feet, the governor interprets the action of the engineers as indicating their belief that ocean vessels will not use the canal and that the smaller depth was recommended solely to meet the needs of Lake carriers. This is an assumption which those familiar with the situation can readily show to be absurd. The Dominion of Canada now has in progress the enlargement of the Welland Canal, connecting Lake Erie and Lake Ontario, to provide a depth of 25 feet at extreme low water, but the sills of the locks are to be placed at a depth of 30 feet, so that the capacity of the canal can be readily increased at any time by merely dredging out the reaches. The Welland Canal will control the draft of vessels which may enter Lake Erie, and it is entirely proper that the development of the St. Lawrence should proceed similarly. It was, moreover, clearly determined that with a channel 25 feet deep at low water, under the conditions of protected navigation which will obtain between Lake Ontario and Montreal, vessels of a size and draft adapted for developing the ocean trade of the Great Lakes will be able to navigate freely.

EFFORTS OF OPPONENTS TO CREATE FALSE IMPRESSION REGARDING DRAFTS OF OCEAN FREIGHT VESSELS.

Part of the propaganda against the St. Lawrence improvement has included an effort to give the impression that vessels having a draft of 35 feet will be required to successfully develop ocean trade to and from Lake ports. Fortunately statements of this kind which, if true, would render this improvement less valuable, are readily refuted by official records. The deep-draft vessels of the world are the big passenger liners. These vessels are really floating hotels, with four or more decks, and to balance this lofty superstructure they must extend deep below the surface of the water. The vessels which carry the commerce of the world, known as cargo vessels, are quite different in construction and draft. Most valuable information upon this subject is afforded by the Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers for 1921, which is now in process of publication. This interesting study by the Corps of Engineers is most timely, and I wish to quote some figures from it which will expose one more of the fallacious arguments against the improvement of the St. Lawrence River.

In recent years there has been quite an insistent demand for increased depths at harbors upon the belief that existing depths prevent the use of such harbors by modern freight vessels. Neither Lloyd's register nor the list of merchant vessels of the United States contains information relative to drafts of vessels, and very little information has heretofore been compiled upon the subject in such form as to be usable in the consideration of the worthiness of providing additional depths at our harbors. Complete records are kept, however, of the drafts of vessels passing through the Panama Canal. Since this canal has sufficient depth for the accommodation of the largest vessels, and is a gateway for traffic between world ports of the largest capacity, information relative to the drafts of vessels using this canal should give a fairly correct view of drafts of vessels which carry the world's commerce. A study has therefore been made of drafts of vessels using the Panama Canal during the calendar year 1920 and the results are given in this report.

Of 2,813 merchant vessels passing through the canal during 1920 to and from all ports of the world, 71.49 per cent drew under 25 feet and 98.79 per cent drew under 30 feet.

A total of 1,085 vessels from ports of the United States passed through the canal, and of these 65.37 per cent drew under 25 feet and 98.56 per cent drew under 30 feet. The vessels bound from ports of the United States in general were loaded deeper than vessels bound to ports of the United States. Of the latter there were a total of 731, of which 71.68 per cent drew under 25 feet and 99.04 per cent drew under 30 feet.

The only ports of the United States to which vessels were bound through the Panama Canal drawing 30 feet or over were New York, Norfolk, Newport News, Charleston, New Orleans, and San Francisco, and the total of these vessels was 23. While there were seven vessels bound from New York drawing 30 feet or over, there was only one vessel bound for New York in this class.

Of 521 vessels carrying general cargo to and from ports of the United States, 69.47 per cent drew under 25 feet and 98.64 per cent drew under 30 feet.

Of 188 vessels carrying nitrates to United States ports, 65.44 per cent drew under 25 feet and 97.89 per cent drew under 30 feet.

As a class the vessels carrying petroleum products have the greatest average draft. Of 101 such vessels, 27.72 per cent drew under 25 feet and 94.06 per cent drew under 30 feet. Fifty-four vessels, or 53.5 per cent of the total, drew between 25 and 28 feet.

Forty-nine vessels carried lumber from United States ports through the canal, of which 85.68 per cent drew under 25 feet and 100 per cent drew under 29 feet. Thirty-four vessels, or 69.6 per cent, drew between 20 and 25 feet.

One hundred and sixteen vessels carried flour and grain from Pacific ports through the canal, of which 44.83 per cent drew under 25 feet and 99.14 per cent drew under 29 feet.

These vessels proceeded from and to all ports of the world. The figures show that there is an abundance of freight carriers now in successful use which will be well adapted to the depths proposed in the St. Lawrence River. In fact, there is a large number of successful ports throughout the world which can not accommodate vessels of over 25 feet draft, and at some the vessels used are even smaller. To quote a practical shipping man relative to the suitability of the proposed St. Lawrence ship channel for ocean vessels, Hon. Magnus Swenson, president of the Norwegian-American Line, has stated that on the day that this waterway is opened to the sea his ships will be found poking their noses into the Great Lakes. Mr. Swenson regards as ridiculous the contention that ocean vessels can not navigate the channels of the Great Lakes, and he has called attention to the fact that while the Lake carrier is wide and unwieldly, the ocean carrier has finer lines and is more easily maneuvered. The assertions regarding the difficulty of navigating ocean vessels in a channel of the dimensions which it is proposed to construct have no foundation in fact. [Applause.]

Navigation facilities which will be made available to ocean vessels by construction of the proposed ship channel between Lake Ontario and Montreal.

The above shows that there will be only 31 miles of artificial canal required to reach Lake Ontario, 56 miles to reach Lake Erie, 59.5 miles to reach Lake Michigan, and 61.1 miles to reach Lake Superior.

ALLEGED DIVERSION OF TRADE TO FOREIGN PORTS.

The governor of New York states that the St. Lawrence ship channel, "if commercially successful, would merely serve to divert shipping from our own ports to a foreign country." What are the foreign ports to which our business would be diverted? Montreal is at the head of ocean navigation on the St. Lawrence, and by reason of being the farthest point inland to which ocean vessels can penetrate, has become the chief seaport of Canada. By what process of reasoning can it be concluded that the extension of this route to Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit, Chicago, Milwaukee, Racine, Ashland, Washburn, Superior, and Duluth will divert shipping to foreign ports? The contrary is more reasonable, and were it not for the fact that ship channels of this character result in important benefits to all ports located upon them, it might be concluded that shipping would be diverted from Montreal to the American ports of the Great Lakes. Such was the contention of Liverpool, which violently opposed the construction of the Manchester Canal, and declared, just as we now hear the opponents of the St. Lawrence ship channel declare, in one breath that it was impracticable and in another breath that it would ruin Liverpool. Time proved that the ship canal passing by Liverpool, with 35 miles of the most restricted character of artificial canal, crossed by numerous highways and viaducts and with five sets of locks, involving an expenditure of more than $100,000,000 solely to avoid one transfer of cargo and a rail haul of 50 miles, was a paying investment, and that Liverpool was not injured but on the contrary was greatly benefited by the resulting industrial and commercial development of the hinterland. So it will be with Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific ports, as well as with Montreal, although some interests at the latter city, contrary to the views of the governor of New York, are fearful that the extension of ship navigation beyond Montreal will result in the diversion of shipping to the American ports of the Great Lakes and to ports on the Atlantic seaboard.

SUPERIOR ECONOMY OF THE BULK LAKE CARRIER IS AN ARGUMENT FOR THE SHIP CHANNEL.

Opponents of the St. Lawrence Ship Channel, including Gov. Miller, refer to the fact that the bulk carrier of the Great Lakes is more economical than the ocean carrier. This is true, but it has no bearing upon the advisability of providing a ship channel between the Great Lakes and the sea. The bulk lake carrier can not go to sea, and under present conditions it can not even meet the ocean vessel. These vessels usually draw from 19 to 21 feet, but many of them are capable of loading up to 24 feet. The heaviest loads, a few of which have equaled 14,000 tons, are carried at times of high water, when ships can load to more than 21 feet. The effort of the opponents of the St. Lawrence improvement in seeking to give the impression that these vessels customarily carry 14,000 tons is in strict accord with their obvious purpose to emasculate the truth. The average load of the largest lake vessels is reported by the engineers in charge of the St. Marys Falls Canal as 7,746 tons. Only 8 per cent of the total traffic is carried in vessels of 6,000 net registered tons and over; 27 per cent is carried in vessels between 5,000 and 6,000 tons, 27 per cent in vessels between 4,000 and 5,000 tons, and 26 per cent in vessels between 3,000 and 4,000 tons. All lake vessels having a capacity of 14,000 tons and more have a length of over 600 feet, and of these there are only 42 on the lakes out of a total of 733 vessels. The largest number of carriers, segregated by length, is found to be in the 400 to 499 foot class, and of these there are 155. Lake vessels of this length have a cargo capacity of 5,000 to 8,000 tons, or about the same as standard steel ocean freight vessels of 6,000 to 8,800 dead-weight tons which will be able to enter the Great Lakes when the proposed 25-foot ship channel has been provided. The contention of opponents regarding this matter is a deliberate misrepresentation designed to deceive those unfamiliar with the facts.

The rate on grain from Lake Michigan ports to Buffalo this season by lake vessel has averaged 1.5 cents per bushel, and from Lake Superior ports to Buffalo about 1.8 cents per bushel. The rate from upper lake ports by water to Montreal this season has been 8 cents per bushel. The average rate per bushel on wheat by Barge Canal between Buffalo and New York was 9.3 cents in 1918, 8.2 cents in 1919, and 10.3 cents in 1920, as reported by the Buffalo Chamber of Commerce, and the total rate by lake and canal from Chicago to New York in 1920 was 14.6 cents. The average haul of the lake carrier from upper lake ports to Buffalo is over 900 miles. It will be seen that the rate per ton-mile by lake vessel is only a fraction of the ton-mile rate using a barge suitable for either the 12-foot Barge Canal or the present 14-foot canals of the St. Lawrence River. Rates via the Barge Canal have never been as low as rates by the lake bulk carrier.

The logical deduction to be made from the arguments regarding the relative economy of the ocean and lake carriers is that, with the completion of the Welland Canal and the proposed improvement of the St. Lawrence, these wonderfully economical carriers should proceed as far as practicable through the Lakes and down the St. Lawrence River. By no stretch of fancy can it be contended that they should unload at Buffalo and transfer their cargo to rail or to a less economical carrier operating on the Barge Canal when they will be able to take grain to Montreal direct for not more than 3 cents per bushel. If grain were the only commodity to be considered, the Lake carrier should carry its load at least as far as Ogdensburg. In any intelligent study of overseas traffic, however, grain can not be considered alone, since it is an important factor in making up the cargoes of vessels carrying general cargo. The general cargo is available chiefly at Chicago, Milwaukee, Duluth-Superior, Detroit, Cleveland, and Toledo. The bulk Lake carrier can not carry general cargo and the package Lake carrier can not carry bulk grain; but the ocean carrier is built to carry both bulk grain and package freight. The grain, flour, and other bottom cargo is loaded first, and it is a fortunate coincidence that on the Great Lakes these are especially abundant at the ports constituting the logical termini of the ocean routes. Thus there will be afforded the most favorable conditions for the development of ocean service, and, as has been the case at Atlantic ports, the grain will be carried at a very low rate because of its value as ballast, and the profits from the operation of the ship will be derived chiefly from the general cargo consisting of high-class freight on which the rail charge to seaboard alone now ranges between $20 and $40 per ton. The grain which goes in full cargoes may be transshipped from bulk Lake carrier to ocean carrier at suitable ports on the St. Lawrence River, giving the Lake vessel as long a haul as possible, in order that the shipper may derive the utmost saving. It has been asserted by the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, however, that it is entirely feasible to design an ocean-going vessel suitable for service on the Great Lakes, with a cargo capacity of 7,000 tons, a draft of 20 feet, and a speed of 11 knots. On this basis the proposed ship channel 25 feet deep at low water will accommodate an ocean vessel of 10,000 tons capacity or more, adapted particularly to this service. Grain and flour are now carried from Pacific to Atlantic ports by way of the Panama Canal, and with the opening of the Great Lakes to ocean vessels suitable vessels will be able to carry it coastwise to Portland and Boston at very much lower cost than by any existing routes.

Evidence as to the economy of the bulk Lake carrier is no argument against the deepening of the channel of the St. Lawrence River; on the contrary it is a powerful argument in favor of any improvement which will give these vessels a longer haul. The competition between ocean and Lake carriers, to which Gov. Miller alludes, is mythical. In the journey of grain from Superior or Duluth to Liverpool by way of Buffalo, the Lake vessel has a haul of 988 miles, the rail lines 450 miles, and the ocean vessel from New York 3,578 statute miles. From Chicago the Lake vessel has a haul of 895 miles. The haul across the State of New York is the expensive part of the journey, distance considered. The ocean carrier entering the Great Lakes therefore will not be competing with the Lake carrier alone, but with a route involving other more expensive methods of transportation, and the study of rates shows that a very great saving will be effected on the movement to Liverpool as a whole. It is absurd to estimate the ability of the ocean vessel on the basis of the movement as far as Buffalo alone.

EFFORTS OF NEW YORK INTERESTS TO SHOW DIMINISHING GRAIN TRADE ARE INCONSISTENT WITH THEIR ACTION IN CONSTRUCTING BARGE CANAL AND GRAIN ELEVATORS—GRAIN NEEDED AT OTHER PORTS MORE THAN AT NEW YORK.

The governor of New York states that "the exports of cereals of all kinds from all of the Atlantic and Gulf ports last year were only 7,655,160 tons, and long before the St. Lawrence canal can possibly be constructed the increasing consumption of our own country will require a very large part, if not all, of that surplus, and the only grain for export in sight to be carried on such a route 10 years hence will be the products of western Canada." If such be the case it might be inquired why the city of New York, as explained by the governor in another paragraph, is proceeding with the construction of elevators to handle export grain. Indeed, if the tendency is as alleged, it may be wondered why the State of New York enlarged the barge canal at all. The real truth is that the per capita production in the United States has steadily increased. In 1849 the production of wheat was 100,486,000 bushels or 4.36 bushels per capita; in 1859 the per capita production was 5.58 bushels; in the period 1866–1870 it was 6.49 bushels; in the period 1871–1880 it was 7.54 bushels; and in the period 1911–1918 the average yearly production was 777,734,000 bushels, or 7.93 bushels per capita, which was larger than for any previous period. In 1916 the movement of grain to Atlantic ports alone amounted to 687,393,298 bushels or about 20,000,000 tons.

Gov. Miller's statement gives an erroneous view of the export grain movement. There is appended a table showing the exports of domestic cereals only through seven principal customs districts of the Atlantic and Gulf coasts for the eight years from 1913 to 1920, inclusive. In the latter year the exports through these districts amounted to more than 9,000,000 tons of domestic cereals, to which must be added the Canadian cereals exported through Portland, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, averaging about 1,000,000 tons annually, or a total movement of more than 10,000,000 tons for export alone. The economic conditions governing the movement of grain are such that very little of this should go by way of the Barge Canal. Irrespective of its insufficient capacity, and its greater expense as compared with some other competing routes, it would be a national calamity for grain to be diverted from Gulf ports to New York, because the grain is needed at those ports for deadweight cargo. The cotton ports of the South must have heavy cargo of some kind in order to make up properly balanced loads. Grain is admirably adapted to this purpose, and in the interests both of the cotton trade and of our merchant marine we must see that the grain now passing through these ports is not diverted to New York, which does not need it for the maintenance of proper load conditions for vessels. The economical movement of our export grain and the necessities of ships demand an intelligent distribution through ports so situated as logically to compete for the business.

The grain of the North Central and Northwestern States should find its outlet through ports of the Pacific coast and the new ocean ports of the Great Lakes. Some will also move by way of Atlantic ports, and this movement will be greatly augmented during the winter. In fact, Portland, Me., and Boston, Mass., may expect to obtain more grain than at present. The grain of the Central Western States should move partly through Lake ports and partly through south Atlantic and Gulf ports, and the grain of the more southerly territory should move entirely through Gulf ports. The opening of the Great Lakes to ocean vessels does not mean that all the grain will go out by this route; it does mean, however, that other routes to seaboard will have to make rates which will meet the competition of the Lake route, and in either case the producer will be benefited. [Applause.]

LENGTH OF RESTRICTED NAVIGATION BETWEEN MONTREAL AND THE GREAT LAKES IS INSUFFICIENT TO CONSTITUTE A VALID OBJECTION.

Some opponents of the St. Lawrence Ship Channel have sought to create the impression that ocean ships will not enter the Great Lakes. Vessels now reach Montreal, 1,003 miles from the sea, and this port has attained supremacy in the grain trade of the continent. Only 182 miles now separate the ocean vessel from the Great Lakes, and of this amount the length of restricted navigation will be no greater than is now traversed every day in the Manchester Canal from Liverpool to Manchester. Surely no sane person will contend that navigation by ocean vessels as far as Lake Ontario will present any serious obstacles. Having reached Lake Ontario the ocean vessel has a clear passage at full speed to any port on this lake. If the ocean vessel does not penetrate farther into the interior, the improvement will be justified, because it will bring to American ports ships which can now reach only Canadian ports. Under these conditions Oswego and Ogdensburg would become important seaports, and it should be noted that the sentiment of northern New York is favorable to the improvement with the exception of points near Buffalo. With the completion of the enlarged Welland Canal, now in progress, the ocean vessel will be able to pass through this canal 25 miles in length and less difficult of passage than the Manchester Canal, thus reaching Lake Erie, where full-speed navigation will be available to the important cities of Cleveland, Toledo, Erie, Buffalo, Conneaut, Lorain, Ashtabula, and others. At some of these ports the conditions are ideal for establishing successful ocean service, in that there is an abundance of both dead weight and top cargo, bunker coal and fuel oil at low rates, and ample ship-repair facilities. If the ocean vessel should proceed no farther than Lake Erie, the benefits to the people of the United States would be tremendous.

Bear in mind that a very large volume of grain now proceeds from Lake Superior to Georgian Bay ports, where it is unloaded into elevators and is then carried by rail to Montreal, where it is again elevated and later loaded into ocean vessels. With the ocean vessel in either Lake Ontario or Lake Erie, the movement by rail from Georgian Bay to Montreal during the navigation season will become an unnecessary extravagance. Still greater economy will be effected, however, by loading grain directly at Lake Superior and Lake Michigan points to the extent of about one-half the capacity of the ocean vessel, completing loading with top cargo and taking on bunker coal at Lake Erie ports. The capacity of the ordinary ocean freight vessel is divided into about one-half grain and one-half bale cargo, thus permitting the plan to be operated successfully. No deepening of the channels above Lake Erie will be required to meet these conditions.

UNWARRANTED INTERPRETATION PLACED ON RECENT REPORT OF ARMY ENGINEERS.

In the effort to give the impression that the St. Lawrence Ship Channel offers no advantages over the barge canal, Gov. Miller makes the following statement:

In 1920 a report by the board of Army engineers was submitted to Congress on the feasibility of a ship canal connecting the Great Lakes with the Hudson. They said that it would need to be 30-foot depth to accommodate ocean-going vessels with a draft of 27½ feet, and such vessels only have a capacity of about 7,000 tons, as against the Lake freighters' capacity of 14,000 tons with a draft of less than 22 feet. They said that a ship canal could be built connecting the Great Lakes and the Hudson, but that it would not be navigated by ocean-going vessels, as the barge was the most economical for restricted waterways.

The investigation in question was not made by a board of engineers, but by one officer known as the district engineer, who is stationed at Buffalo. In accordance with law, his report was referred to the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors. The board did not express the views credited to it by Gov. Miller, but stated:

No doubt if an adequate waterway were made available with suitable terminal and transfer facilities at the principal Lake ports a large amount of general merchandise and most of the grain might be carried through the canal either in ocean-going vessels or in Lake vessels, transferring at New York.

It pointed out that the construction of a ship channel along the same route as the barge canal would involve the loss of the funds used for the construction of the barge canal. Its conclusions were as follows:

In view of the foregoing and of the investigation of the St. Lawrence River now being made by the International Joint Commission, the board concurs with the district and division engineers in the opinion that it is not advisable at this time for the United States to undertake the construction of a waterway admitting ocean-going vessels to the Great Lakes.

It will be observed that the board did not concur in the views of the district engineer regarding the details of his report, but only in the final conclusion, and this conclusion was reached particularly in view of the possibility that the investigation of the St. Lawrence River would offer a better remedy for the transportation needs of the Northwest.

In forwarding to Congress the reports on the investigation the Chief of Engineers, Maj. Gen. Lansing H. Beach, makes the following statements:

In reference to the desirability of the proposed canal, the district engineer states that this would depend chiefly upon how much of the 100,000,000 tons or more of present through lake commerce would use the new canal and what saving of freight charges, if any, would be effected. It should be borne in mind, however, that the need for economical transportation of the present bulk commerce of the Lakes is not the only need to be met. The great manufacturing cities of the Lakes now have a tremendous export and import traffic passing through Atlantic ports, chiefly New York. This traffic is now carried by rail and is subject to heavy charges for freight and terminal and transfer costs. * * *

After due consideration of the above-mentioned reports I concur in the views of the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, as expressed above, and in the conclusion reached by the board and the district and division engineers that the construction by the United States of a waterway between the Great Lakes and the Hudson River, admitting ocean-going vessels to the Great Lakes, is not deemed advisable at the present time.

Instead of concurring in the views expressed by the district engineer, it will be observed that the Chief of Engineers expressly refrained from such a concurrence. He concurs, however, in the views of the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors and in the conclusion that the construction of a waterway for ships between the Great Lakes and the Hudson River is not advisable. There is nothing whatsoever in the report of the reviewing board and of the Chief of Engineers to cast any doubt upon the commercial practicability of a ship channel by way of the St. Lawrence River, but, on the contrary, it is shown that there is an enormous tonnage of manufactured goods requiring more economical transportation to destination, and that were a really adequate waterway available a large traffic would undoubtedly develop.

BARGE CANAL HAS NO EFFECT UPON RAIL RATES.

The governor further states that "already, this very season, marked reductions have been effected both in rail and water rates, due to the operation of the canal." To anyone familiar with transportation the suggestion that the small amount of grain carried on the barge canal, amounting to about 1 per cent of the total easterly movement, has had any influence upon rail rates is ridiculous. Railroads operating to the Gulf have applied for permission to increase grain rates on the contention that no weight should be given to the influence of the Mississippi as a competing route. The real reason for the decrease in rates on grain to Atlantic ports is to be found in the competition of the Gulf ports and in the movement to Montreal. Rail rates on grain to New York are higher than to Philadelphia and Baltimore, which have no barge canal. During the present year an enormous amount of grain has been shipped to elevators on Georgian Bay and thence by Canadian rail lines to Montreal, and a large amount has gone down the St. Lawrence to the same port. These are the causes of the reduction in rail rates on grain, supplemented by the evidence submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission by western shippers regarding the excessive transportation costs on these products as compared with the market prices.

The above analysis of the statements made by Gov. Miller is sufficient to show that the criticisms made against the St. Lawrence River project have no foundation in fact and are merely part of the propaganda to influence the views of those who have not made a personal investigation of the engineering and economic features of the project.

PARTNERSHIP WITH CANADA.

Objection is raised to the St. Lawrence route because it is a joint development with Canada. Such an objection can not be sincere and can be raised only in a frantic effort to find some excuse for the continued monopoly of the port of New York and control of the toll gates at Buffalo. It is not a question of going into partnership with Canada. We are already in that splendid partnership by reason of our treaties already made. It is a question of the development, control, and administration of common property owned jointly by treaty rights for the common good of both countries.

We can not afford to repudiate this right gained by the treaty through the sturdy and far-sighted diplomacy of our forefathers. What a colossal mistake not to join whole-heartedly with Canada on a fifty-fifty basis in its full and complete development. Indeed, the opposition to this monumental project is based, in my opinion, upon false information and careless reasoning. As far as any interference by any other nation is concerned, the gates of the St. Lawrence are as safe for the United States as are the gates of the Mississippi or the Columbia. Indeed, a joint development with common interests with Canada will insure us a larger control and a greater security. [Applause.]

AGREEMENTS WITH FOREIGN STEAMSHIP LINES.

At this point I want to discuss briefly another heresy which has been advanced for the purpose of casting doubt upon the wisdom of the improvement. I refer to the suggestion that we should not participate in opening up any trade routes not entirely in American waters. This is a question which should be decided solely upon the benefits to American commerce and shipping. Our foreign trade must of necessity pass through foreign waters. The really important consideration is that our goods be carried in American ships. At some of our Atlantic ports the trunk-line railroads have entered into agreements with foreign steamship lines under which they grant these lines free dockage facilities and agree to turn over to them as much freight as the railroads can obtain. Under these conditions the foreign lines have an overwhelming advantage and American vessels are unable to get more than a small share of the traffic. At one important port all the grain elevators are at piers of railroads having preferential agreements with foreign lines, and grain from this port is carried almost exclusively in foreign bottoms. Here is a situation which demands correction before we can place our merchant marine in profitable operation. It is infinitely more important than the question of the ownership of routes through which American vessels must pass in foreign trade.

The boundary waters of the United States have been improved both by the United States and Canada. At Sault Ste. Marie there is one Canadian lock and three American locks. All of these locks are used freely by the vessels of either country. The Welland Canal is entirely in Canadian waters, but it is free to American vessels, as are also the present 14-foot canals of the St. Lawrence River. The treaty of 1909 guarantees equal treatment of American and British vessels in all these waters. Canada has spent funds in the improvement of Limekiln Crossing, Detroit River, and the United States has deposited dredged material on the Canadian side of the St. Clair River. The efforts to improve the navigation facilities of these waters have proceeded in the most friendly way. The interests are mutual. Canada has the same big problem as the United States in the development of her vast interior and in opening economical outlets for her surplus production. No technical objection should be permitted to impede even for a moment the consummation of this worthy purpose. As a matter of fact, the contribution of the Welland Canal to the through route to the sea at the entire expense of Canada insures us more than a square deal in the division of the expense.

CONFLICTING VIEWS OF NEW YORK INTERESTS AND THE REAL REASON FOR THEIR ANTAGONISM.

The several quotations from the governor's speech are referred to solely to show to what extremes the opponents of the St. Lawrence improvement are willing to go in the effort to divert attention from the real issues involved in this great work. Their attack has taken the form of denunciations, ridicule, and sweeping denials of incontrovertible facts, and while declaring on the one hand that the ship channel would not be used, they have sought the aid of Atlantic and Gulf ports by representing that it would divert the commerce from them. Neither of the premises is correct and both have been refuted repeatedly. While opponents of the proposition at Buffalo and New York City have endeavored to show that there is no commerce in the great West seeking the sea, Hon. Ledyard P. Hale, attorney for the public-service commission of New York, has publicly advocated the improvement and made the significant declaration that "The smaller cities of the East will be compelled to take the lead in this great project." In commenting upon Judge Hale's public declaration, the Albany Times-Union, of which former Gov. Martin H. Glynn is publisher and editor, removes all doubt as to New York's real view regarding the commercial practicability of the St. Lawrence route by the following statement:

> It is difficult, indeed, to comprehend the perspective which induced him to espouse this project which, if consummated, will not only cripple the canals of New York but will deal a body blow at the supremacy of the port of New York and will seriously menace the commercial prosperity of this State.

Thus we find that in the frantic efforts of opponents of this project to prevent the opening of a route which will remove some of the tolls from American and Canadian trade most amusing and contradictory contentions have been advanced.

Mr. W. H. Chandler, for the opposition, objects to the diversion of traffic from railroads to water routes because of the provision of the transportation act which requires the Interstate Commerce Commission so to fix rates as to enable the carriers to earn a reasonable return on the property devoted to public use. He likewise objects to the water-power development because it will rob the railroads of some of their coal traffic. Gov. Miller, however, hopes to see all of the waterways developed, with the single exception of the St. Lawrence, and he is in favor of the development of water power except on the St. Lawrence, where he would permit it to run to waste.

The arguments of the governor of New York are not new. The record of the hearings before the international joint commission show that they have all been advanced at the New York, Albany, and Buffalo hearings, and that upon cross-examination of witnesses they have been shown to be of the most flimsy weave. At the New York hearing on October 19, 1920, Mr. Lewis Nixon, who has constructed vessels, stated that ships could not make more than 5 miles per hour in a river channel such as the St. Lawrence throughout its entire length, and that several feet must be available below the keel.

THE REAL FACTS REGARDING THE ADEQUACY OF THE PROPOSED SHIP CHANNEL FOR NAVIGATION BY OCEAN FREIGHT VESSELS.

Later Capt. Joseph W. Proctor was called to the stand by the opponents of the improvement because of the fact that he had navigated the St. Lawrence River. When asked what speed he would make in a river such as the St. Lawrence or Hudson, he replied that he would make full speed, and he proved a very good witness for the improvement by stating that he had brought his ship through the Welland Canal with only 1 inch to spare. But, then, Capt. Proctor is not a politician and should not know about these things. What are the real facts regarding the depth required below the keel? The greater the speed the greater is the margin of depth required, because of the squat of the ship. In rough water, such as is encountered at entrances to ocean ports, additional depth is required because of the "send" or plunge of the ship. Freight vessels are of slow speed, usually 9 to 11 knots, and require less depth below the keel in protected water, such as the St. Lawrence, than do fast passenger vessels. Nevertheless, the freight vessel should have several feet below the keel when moving at full speed. We must keep in mind the fact that the St. Lawrence River for a distance of 1,003 miles from the Atlantic Ocean to Montreal is now a practicable ship channel, and that depths in this stretch are fully adequate for full-speed navigation. From Montreal to Lake Ontario is a distance of 182 miles, of which 117 miles is suitable for full-speed navigation. This 117 miles includes the upper 68 miles between Lake Ontario and Galoup Island, in which there is a depth of 30 feet and over, with a minimum width of 500 feet, a stretch of 31 miles through Lake St. Francis, and a stretch of 16 miles in Lake St. Louis. Throughout all the sections named there is ample depth, except at two or three points, which will be deepened under the proposed plan. This leaves 65 miles requiring radical improvement to reach Lake Ontario and open the Great Lakes to ocean vessels. Under the plan contemplated this part of the river will be converted by dams into long pools of deep water, except at several short sections, where, for reasons of economy, lateral canals are proposed. In all there will be seven lift locks and two guard locks. Fully one-half of the 65 miles requiring improvement will afford depth suitable for full-speed navigation. In passing through the locks a few inches of water below the keel will suffice, and in passing through the shoal sections at reduced speed a margin of a foot will be desirable.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin has now eight minutes remaining.

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Can the gentleman from Tennessee now state whether he can yield me some of his time?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 minutes of my time.

Mr. A. P. NELSON. I wish to thank the gentleman from Tennessee for his courtesy.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin will be recognized for 10 additional minutes, making in all 18 minutes.

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, the delay to the ship because of lockages and reduced speed where required will amount to only a fraction of a day, which is of no importance in a transatlantic voyage, as indicated by the fact that rates from all North Atlantic ports to Europe are the same, notwithstanding the fact that Baltimore is more than 500 miles farther from Liverpool than Boston and requires about two days more per trip. The total loss of time due to locks and restricted channels between the Atlantic Ocean and Duluth, Minn., under the plan recommended by the engineers, will be about 18 hours. Any practical shipping man knows that this delay is of no consequence as affecting the ability of the vessel to operate profitably. The additional expense involved as compared with the cost of shipping from Atlantic ports is only a very small fraction of the present cost of getting goods from the Northwest to the seaboard.

THE CAPACITY OF THE BARGE CANAL IS INSUFFICIENT TO AFFORD PERCEPTIBLE RELIEF TO TRAFFIC, AND IT IS NOT SUITABLE FOR ALL CLASSES OF GOODS SEEKING MORE ECONOMICAL TRANSPORTATION.

It has been suggested by the governor of New York and others that the Barge Canal will meet the needs of the Northwest as an outlet to the sea. In answer to this I wish to invite attention to a few pertinent facts. The opponents of the St. Lawrence improvement, in speaking of the ability of the Barge Canal to handle the traffic of the West, invariably confine their remarks to grain. Grain is only one of the many commodities demanding more economical transportation to the seaboard. Every commodity entering into the foreign trade of the Northwest is vitally concerned in the St. Lawrence ship channel. The total foreign commerce of the United States carried on vessels in 1920 is reported by the Chief of Engineers as 100,384,206 tons. Of this, 40,000,000 tons pertain to the section tributary to the St. Lawrence River. This commerce is now carried by rail to various seaports, principally New York, and the cost of the rail haul plus transfers is so great as to constitute a heavy burden to the country and to seriously affect our ability to compete in foreign markets. In addition to this traffic there is a much larger movement to points on and near the seaboard for domestic consumption. The freight moved by railroads between the Northwest and the Atlantic seaboard now amounts to approximately 250,000,000 tons annually. Coastwise receipts at the seaports of the United States in 1920 amounted to 45,371,489 tons, and coastwise shipments to 49,153,031 tons, while the commerce carried on the Great Lakes amounted to 111,139,686 tons. The distance by water between the ports of the Great Lakes and Atlantic ports averages less than 50 per cent of the distances between Atlantic and Pacific ports via the Panama Canal, and the relation of the water distance to rail distance is just as favorable for successful competition between water and rail carriers. The traffic of the country is increasing annually, and, as already stated, the rail movement is so great as to cause great congestion and delay. To meet these heavy traffic demands New York offers us the Barge Canal, with a total capacity of only 10,000,000 tons in each direction. Gen. Wotherspoon, formerly superintendent of public works of the State of New York, has shown that the industries along the canal will within a few years supply a greater tonnage than the canal can carry. All canals of this character carry more local freight than through freight, and the Barge Canal in the past has carried three times as much local freight as through freight. This ratio will allow less than 4,000,000 tons of through freight in each direction, and this only for a short time, until the industries of the State finally require the full capacity. My colleague, Hon. V. M. BRENNEN, of Michigan, who recently made an inspection of the Barge Canal, gives the following conclusive statement of its practical operation:

It is beyond my comprehension to understand how anyone who had made the slightest study of the subject could seriously contend that the New York Barge Canal ever could act as a substitute for the proposed St. Lawrence Ship Canal. It has always been difficult for me to perceive why the two projects should be discussed together. Essentially they present two entirely different methods of transportation. The St. Lawrence offers a through passage without interruption for fast lake and ocean-going vessels from the cities on the Great Lakes to the ports overseas. The New York Barge Canal is what its name indicates—canal for barges, necessarily limited in speed and tonnage, and always involving the expense and delay of transshipping and rehandling through cargoes at Buffalo and again at the city of New York. The proposed ship canal will be either 25 or 30 feet deep, designed to accommodate all but the most mammoth ocean liners. The depth of the Barge Canal is permanently fixed at 12 feet. It is crossed by a multitude of low, stationary bridges which will always prevent its use by any other than the most primitive types of boats.

In 1920 receipts at Buffalo by way of the Barge Canal amounted to 371,049 tons, of which sand, stone, and clay amounted to 261,774 tons. Shipments via the canal amounted to 208,670 tons, of which grain constituted 130,000 tons and iron 62,680 tons. The total movement of grain to the Atlantic seaboard for export and domestic consumption amounts to 15,000,000 to 20,000,000 tons annually. It will therefore be seen that the capacity of the canal, considering the local traffic which can not be crowded off, is wholly insufficient to meet the needs of the grain alone. In recommending the construction of the Barge Canal, however, the committee on canals of the State of New York made the following statement:

It is not alone, however, the export grain trade which requires the enlargement of the Erie Canal. * * * The changes which are now taking place in the iron trade give reason to believe that if an adequate waterway can be secured between Lake Erie and the Hudson River the center of the iron industry can be brought within the State of New York. This has hitherto been within the State of Pennsylvania on account of its resources in ores, coal, and limestone. * * * Indeed it is not too much to expect that with a canal which can carry manufactured steel from Conneaut to New York for 50 cents a ton and distribute this from New York to points on the New England coast without breaking bulk, the vast steel and allied interests centering at Pittsburgh, which support a population greater than that of Chicago, will seek an outlet for their products by rail to Conneaut and thence by Erie Canal rather than across the Alleghenies to Philadelphia.

THE BARGE CANAL ROUTE TO NEW YORK CAN NOT COMPETE WITH PRESENT ROUTES TO MONTREAL.

It has not been shown that the port of Philadelphia has ever been so congested as to require this relief; in fact, Philadelphia is one of the few Atlantic ports which has not suffered seriously from congestion. The governor of New York has apparently overlooked the vast tonnage of iron and steel that is scheduled to seek the barge canal in preference to the port of Philadelphia, but let us not take this too seriously, any more than the thought of the governor that the grain of the West will move in any great amount by way of the barge canal. The reason is obvious. From Buffalo to New York by way of the barge canal is 450 miles. The depth is 12 feet. From Lake Erie to Montreal, by way of the St. Lawrence River, is only 368 miles, the present depth is 14 feet, and the capacity is unlimited. Charter rates on grain from Montreal to Liverpool during the past seasons have been the same as from New York, and Montreal is actually 500 miles nearer Liverpool. There is no inducement for the grain to go to New York, and, in fact, it is not doing so. It is going to Montreal, and so far this year Montreal has exported more grain than any other port on the American Continent, notwithstanding the efforts of the barge canal enthusiasts to make the public believe that the St. Lawrence is an impracticable route because of the fog, currents, and icebergs. Let it be said for the guidance of those who are not personally acquainted with conditions that all the fog, currents, and icebergs are far below Montreal, and that none of these things will be encountered on the section above Montreal which it is now proposed to improve. Their terrors may well be estimated by the difference in insurance rates, amounting to 2½ cents per $100 by way of the St. Lawrence more than by way of New York. With wheat at $1 per bushel, the increased cost on account of insurance is so small that it can not be found in a bushel of wheat.

"THE GRAVEYARD OF THE ATLANTIC."

A great cry has been raised against the St. Lawrence because of fogs and extra hazards to navigation, but only two instances have been mentioned—one the tragic collision of the Titanic with an iceberg, cited by my colleague, Hon. JAMES M. MEAD, of Buffalo, and the other the Empress of India, cited by Mr. Henry W. Hill and Congressman MEAD; but none of these gentlemen have taken the time to investigate the facts, because, as everyone knows, the Titanic did not meet its tragic fate on the St. Lawrence nor within 500 miles of its gulf but out at sea in its feverish race against time from Liverpool to New York. The tragic ending of the Empress of India was not, according to authentic testimony, due to fogs or ice, but from another cause. In trying to find objections to the St. Lawrence route our opponents are even willing to shift the "graveyard of the Atlantic" from hundreds of miles out at sea and plant it on the bottom of the St. Lawrence, and yet their objections concerning fogs are the least foggy of them all. [Applause.]

Upon completion of the enlarged Welland Canal to its preliminary depth of 25 feet, which is now in progress, the bulk-grain carrier will be able to reach Prescott, Ontario, only 120 miles from Montreal, and the prospect of any large grain movement by way of the barge canal will be even less than at present. The enlargement of the Welland Canal by Canada is a brilliant stroke to divert the grain trade from American ports to Montreal, and is well calculated to accomplish the results intended. Long before the St. Lawrence can be opened to ocean vessels and American merchant vessels can take cargoes directly at the American ports of the Great Lakes, Montreal will have achieved supremacy in the grain trade. And New York would have us defer this improvement to see what effect the barge canal, with a one-way capacity of 10,000,000 tons, will have upon a traffic situation involving between 200,000,000 and 300,000,000 tons annually. I am not unmindful of the value of the barge canal as an auxiliary route for traffic between the Great Lakes and the Atlantic seaboard, and its cost is fully warranted by the important influence it will have upon industrial development in the area tributary to it, but its capacity is wholly insufficient to meet the many needs of both local and through traffic, and the necessity for transfers renders it unsuitable for general package freight destined for export. Such freight seeks rail and ocean transportation and is rarely carried on canals.

WATERWAY WILL SAVE ANNUALLY MORE THAN ITS ENTIRE COST AND RENDER UNNECESSARY MUCH GREATER EXPENSE FOR RAILROAD EQUIPMENT.

Before closing my remarks I want to refer to the suggestion of the governor of New York that the expenditure involved is too great to be considered by the Government at this time. The saving on grain alone is estimated by competent men in the grain business, including Mr. Julius H. Barnes, formerly Director United States Grain Corporation, to amount to from 5 to 10 cents per bushel, and this will affect not only the grain exported but all the grain produced in the territory within the influence of the waterway. Indeed, this effect would be accomplished even though we should have no grain to export. The price is fixed at Liverpool and the American producer has the right to export his grain if he wishes. The domestic price must therefore equal the price which he would receive at Liverpool, less the cost of transportation, elevation, and incidental expenses. On the grain produced within the territory affected the saving will amount to approximately $350,000,000 per year, or more than double the amount which the United States will be required to contribute to the improvement. The saving on other commodities will be very great, and it may be conservatively estimated that the producers of the United States will be benefited to the extent of at least $500,000,000 annually in return for a total expenditure of less than $150,000,000, which will be reimbursed to the Government in full by the revenue derived from water power. This is a high-grade investment. Moreover, there must be expended upon the railroads of the country many billions of dollars before they will be equipped to handle the increasing traffic adequately. The opening of the Great Lakes to ocean vessels will substitute short hauls for some of the present long hauls and greatly increase the car efficiency. It will render part of the expenditure for railroad equipment unnecessary, and in this way more than save its cost. This is true economy. [Applause.]

PLAN NOT A BURDEN ON THE FEDERAL TREASURY.

The governor of New York says: "It is an agitation to get the Federal Government to spend a billion dollars." Now, our good governor knows better than that. Such a statement is mere camouflage, misleading, and not according to fact. The report of the engineers—Col. Wooten for the United States and Mr. Bowden for Canada—shows that plans providing one power dam developing about 1,464,000 horsepower and complete navigation possibilities will cost about $252,728,000, one-half to be assumed by each nation. Not a cent need be expended by either Government. A bond issue backed jointly by the credit of the two nations can easily be sold during the eight years required for the completion of the project.

Mr. W. L. Saunders, of New York, an authority on navigation, in the November number of Mining and Metallurgy, says:

It is estimated that the saving in freight rates would be equivalent annually to the cost of the development to the United States. The income from hydraulic power, made available in the carrying out of the project, would more than pay the fixed charges for interest and sinking fund of a bond issue in sufficient amount to defray the cost of the waterway and structures. It is a 100 per cent investment.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at this point?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. For just a brief question.

Mr. GRIFFIN. How will these bonds of which the gentleman speaks, by which the expense of the undertaking is to be borne, be paid?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. I have already indicated that they can be paid by the revenues to be derived from the water-power development in connection with this project, as is so conclusively stated by W. L. Saunders whom I have just quoted.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Then the return is dependent upon the sale of the water power?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. The return of the cost of the entire project can be obtained from the sale of hydroelectric power as stated.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Out of which the bonds can be paid?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Yes; the bonds can be paid in time from that source as already stated.

THE GREATEST MINDS OF AMERICA RECOGNIZE THE NECESSITY FOR OPENING THE GREAT LAKES TO OCEAN SHIPS.

Let me quote the opinions of a few men whose fidelity to the public welfare is well known and whose competency to discuss the questions involved is undoubted:

STATEMENT BY HON. HERBERT HOOVER, SECRETARY OF COMMERCE.

It would place every port on the Great Lakes on the seas. It would take off a considerable portion of the peak load from the trunk-line railways during the great crop-moving season. It would materially reduce the stricture in the flow of farm products to markets. It would give the railroads the benefit of a better average haul. It would cut the cost of moving farm products. It would give employment for our larger mercantile marine. Fifteen States facing toward the Great Lakes could find an outlet for a portion of their annual surplus quickly and more cheaply. The cost of transportation from the Lake ports to Europe would be greatly diminished and the diminished cost would go directly into the farmer's pocket.

STATEMENT BY JULIUS H. BARNES, FORMERLY DIRECTOR UNITED STATES GRAIN CORPORATION.

Records show that from the time the grain crops begin to move in July in the West the so-called western lines, west of the Mississippi and Chicago, are robbed of their car supply because those cars go on the eastern lines to the Atlantic seaboard. From July until usually February or March, in a general way, the railroads east of the Mississippi have in use from 10 to 20 per cent more cars than they own and the roads west of the Mississippi can lay hands on not more than 80 or 90 per cent of the cars they own. In some instances the cars rolling on individual western lines have fallen to 60 per cent.

There is only one remedy—until this condition is corrected the West is always going to have an inadequate car supply from the time the grain commences to move with harvest until that movement terminates. The simple remedy is to admit the ocean-going fleet to the producing section through the Great Lakes and at the same time to permit the Lake carriers to proceed with their cargoes to the seaboard.

If the cars from the harvest fields terminated their voyage with foreign-bound grain at the western Lake ports they would be retained on the lines which provide them; their carrying capacity would be enormously increased; the normal balance of car supply on the eastern and western lines would be preserved and every business in the country would be relieved at once by a more equal and just flow of car service.

STATEMENT OF H. H. MERRICK, PRESIDENT MISSISSIPPI VALLEY ASSOCIATION.

At Buffalo the wheat is unloaded from the Lake boat into trains or barges—practically all of it goes by train—and this enormous burden of 15,000,000 tons is dumped on top of the Lake traffic, which is already overburdening the railroads in this area. The overload paralyzes them. Embargo results. Wheat blocks the lines, but every class of production is affected.

What is the remedy? Increase in railroad facilities? To carry their regular loads the railroads must spend billions and the problem of credits for this expenditure is serious enough. In addition to that, to require the overstrained and overburdened roads East and West to provide facilities for such a peak load, doubling their equipment, doubling their trackage, establishing more terminals—to lie idle most of the year—would be a herculean feat and an unbankable proposition.

STATEMENT BY DR. GEORGE OTIS SMITH, DIRECTOR UNITED STATES GEOLOGICAL SURVEY.

Looking at the Barge Canal as necessarily having a future far different from its present, I see it as a 350-mile avenue of industries, each using this cheap transportation for its incoming raw materials and outgoing finished product, but that picture can not be realized without an adequate supply of cheap power, and of new power the largest block in sight is the proposed contribution from this same St. Lawrence development. * * * I can see this great advantage of developing a large local business along the Barge Canal without worrying about the possible loss of trunk-line business it does not even now possess. * * *

We must take the national view rather than the sectional view; if we study the facts of interstate commerce, we can not escape the conclusion that what helps the West helps the East—what benefits Minnesota benefits New York. Twenty years ago I heard these same arguments against taxing the East to reclaim western land, but every community thriving on the fruits of its irrigated acres now pays tribute to our eastern manufacturing industries. * * *

Send our goods to market by the shortest and cheapest route, and the whole country will share in the resulting greater profits. No State or nation lives unto itself—let us therefore look at this St. Lawrence project from the all-American point of view.

STATEMENT BY HON. JOSEPHUS DANIELS, FORMERLY SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

The supreme duty of America lies with reference to water and ocean transportation. Before the war the business of the railroads was much greater than could be handled, and it was necessary, when the stress of war came, for the Government to take them over in order to transport the soldiers, supplies, munitions, and materials to the seaboard. The business of our country will continually expand, and it is our duty to secure the lowest transportation costs possible.

A thorough study should be made of inland transportation, and I believe one of the most important improvements is to make it possible to have water transportation for large ships through the Lakes from the Atlantic and by barges down the Mississippi River.

STATEMENT BY JOHN BARTON PAYNE, FORMERLY CHAIRMAN OF UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD.

Referring to the deep waterway between the Lakes and the Atlantic Ocean, you are right in stressing the importance of such a waterway. The importance of Chicago alone, not only as a manufacturing and packing center, but also as a clearing house for shippers generally west of Illinois, argues strongly for bringing to the highest possible state of accessibility and efficiency all means of freight transportation. The study which you are making of inland water transportation in the United States should substantiate the contention that the Great Lakes transportation system, important as it is at present, is in its infancy, and that delay in its development will cost producers, shippers, and consumers millions of dollars yearly.

STATEMENT BY MAJ. GEN. LEONARD WOOD, UNITED STATES ARMY.

In any comprehensive scheme of development the line of water communication from the Great Lakes to the sea via the St. Lawrence is an essential element. It is but an extension of the Great Lakes highway upon which our products may move to market at the most advantageous rates. If we can complete the system, it will be the shortest and most direct route to northern Europe. It will furnish most economical transportation of foodstuffs and raw materials and will furnish a readily available line for transportation to the Atlantic seaboard in case of need.

STATEMENT BY HON. FRANKLIN K. LANE, FORMERLY SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

It has been truly stated that when this work is completed the Great Lakes will be an American Mediterranean Sea for at least eight months of the year, and important Lake cities would become practically seaports, relieving the railroads of a tremendous burden of traffic and enabling the wheat growers of the Middle West to have quicker dispatch to foreign markets at a saving of at least 5 cents per bushel in freight charges.

STATEMENT BY RALPH BUDD, GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY CO.

The benefits accruing to the middle and northwestern sections of the United States as a result of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Tidewater project can not help being apparent to anyone who has given the subject consideration.

The success with which lake-and-rail movement of ore and coal is carried on serves as a splendid illustration of what could be done in a larger way with a tidewater project carried out so that exporting could be carried on freely from this great middle and northwestern territory directly from the termini of the rail lines which serve the territory. It would mean much for an improved car supply in times such as those recently experienced in that cars instead of being lost to the western lines and in that way to the shippers of the Northwest would be unloaded at Lake ports and returned immediately to the territory for other loads.

STATEMENT BY JOHN WANAMAKER.

The Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence will do great work for 40,000,000 people, and surely Congress will see this and in every way facilitate the rapid completion of such an enterprise, which will greatly benefit more than the Middle West and Northwest; and even so, if it were different, the United States is too big and too wise to stand in the way of the St. Lawrence waterway, which in these days seems to be more important than the Northern Pacific Railroad when it was first organized.

STATEMENT BY E. PENNINGTON, PRESIDENT MINNEAPOLIS, ST. PAUL & SAULT STE. MARIE RAILROAD.

The Pacific coast and Southern States have the Panama Canal, which has revolutionized their routes and is enabling them to develop their territory with a certainty of transportation. With the completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence project the great Middle West, now from 1,000 to 1,500 miles from either ocean, will have the ocean transportation brought to their borders * * *.

There is little territory within my knowledge that attempts the export of its products for a distance from the ocean that the Middle West of North America does, and while our transportation rates on the agricultural products have been low compared with land transportation anywhere else, it has still been a handicap to the producers and to the development of the country. The population of the world and the demands for food and necessities of life are increasing. If the United States is to contribute to this demand, its producers must be placed in a position to meet the situation. Water transportation has always been, and will always be, the cheapest and most reliable transportation of the world at all times, and this Great Lakes-St. Lawrence project seems to be one that should be encouraged in every way possible.

STATEMENT BY MR. WALTER PARKER, EXECUTIVE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE MISSISSIPPI VALLEY ASSOCIATION AND GENERAL MANAGER OF THE NEW ORLEANS ASSOCIATION OF COMMERCE.

Some of the people on the Atlantic seaboard, who long have been enjoying some of the fruits of your labors, do not approve of your demand for a channel down the St. Lawrence. They fear such a channel might divert some of your commerce from them. In their efforts to block you they have suggested that New Orleans join them in opposing you. Here is how I replied:

* * * "The northern tier of States in the Mississippi Valley desire an outlet to the Atlantic via the St. Lawrence. If that project be proven to be feasible as an economic thing, we will help them get it.

"In our opinion it is economically wrong for any section to be compelled to function along channels of trade which arbitrarily favor some other section or some other set of business men when the people creating such commerce feel they should have access to other and possibly more economic channels * * *.

"Consequently we do not oppose the project to open a channel through the St. Lawrence, but stand ready to throw the full force of our influence behind such a project whenever it shall be shown that the expenditure of whatever public money may be called for will be justified in an economic sense."

The people of New Orleans are fully alive to the irrefutable economic fact that any public improvement which will result in benefit to the producers in the great central and western areas of the United States is bound to result in good to the port of New Orleans. The production and development of this vast territory depends wholly upon the economic conditions affecting its ability to engage in profitable commercial intercourse with other sections of this great country and with the foreign nations to whom our surplus must be sold.

BENEFITS TO THE FARMERS AND PRODUCERS OF THE WEST WILL BE SHARED WITH INDUSTRY THROUGHOUT THE ENTIRE COUNTRY, RESULTING IN IMPORTANT COMMERCIAL DEVELOPMENT AND IN ENHANCED TRAFFIC THROUGH ALL OF OUR PORTS.

The balance between agriculture and industry has been seriously impaired. The farm price level on November 1, 1921, was about 39.6 per cent lower than a year ago, 56.5 per cent lower than 2 years ago, and 33.7 per cent lower than the average for the past 10 years on November 1. The prices of meat animals—hogs, cattle, sheep, and chickens—on October 15 were 41 per cent lower than a year ago, 43.6 per cent lower than 2 years ago, and 25.5 per cent lower than the average of the past 10 years on October 15. During this period rail rates have increased 100 per cent and more, and while there have been some reductions recently, they are still about 80 per cent higher than the rates five years ago. These conditions have brought about a most serious decrease in the net income of the farmer. It is well known that the prosperity of industry depends upon the purchasing power of the farmer. With this power decreased as it is at the present time, and as it will be until cheaper transportation is obtained, the industries of the country will be retarded. Careful study of the costs of transportation from surplus producing areas to seaboard and to foreign markets shows conclusively that the opening of the Great Lakes to ocean vessels will result in marked improvement in the position of the farmer and will bring about conditions which will encourage production and the development of our vast interior areas. The benefits will be felt not only in a revival of industry, but in a general increase of commerce moving through all the ports of the United States. To meet the needs of the period of prosperity which will follow there must be an adequate number of outlets for traffic equipped with the facilities for economical transfer of goods and for the rapid turn around of ships.

THE WEST PLEDGES SUPPORT IN ESTABLISHING CONDITIONS WHICH WILL EFFECT A BETTER DISTRIBUTION OF TRAFFIC THROUGH OUR PORTS AND IN SECURING AN ADEQUATE DEVELOPMENT OF THE NATION'S WATERWAYS.

Conditions necessitating the movement of commerce by routes which have grown to be congested must be remedied and conditions established under which vessels may be attracted to the important ports not only of the Great Lakes but of the North Atlantic, South Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts. If our country progresses as it must progress, all of these outlets will be necessary, and if our merchant marine is to operate successfully, it must be freed from the shackles which now compel it to operate at congested and inadequate ports. The mere provision of channel facilities, so benevolently suggested by the governor of New York, will not render these outlets available to shipping. There must be a more heroic treatment, a treatment which will encourage commerce and ships to seek these other outlets. We of the West pledge our support in bringing these conditions to pass. We do not confine our pledge of assistance to the mere provision of channel facilities which under present conditions will accomplish no important change in the movement of traffic, but we stand fully behind the provisions of the merchant marine act, which contemplate adequate action to prevent congestion at ports and to bring about the conditions necessary to insure the adequate use by vessels of ports which are properly situated to handle a fair share of the trade of the interior.

The opening of the Great Lakes to ocean vessels constitutes an indispensable part of any logical water transportation system for the United States. An equally indispensable part of such a system is the radical improvement of the Mississippi River and tributaries, with a direct connection between the Mississippi and the Great Lakes and another connection between Lake Erie and the Ohio River. With these arteries established we shall have the foundation of a water transportation system capable of serving traffic in the interests of the Nation as a whole and relieving the producers and shippers of the interior from the excessive costs of rail transportation which are now sapping the lifeblood of our commerce and rendering impracticable the fullest development of our resources. The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the state of the Union and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

Leaves of absence were granted to—

Mr. BRAND (at the request of Mr. CRISP), indefinitely, on account of serious illness;

Mr. FULLER, for one week, on account of important business;

Mr. KLINE of New York, for the balance of the week, on account of death in his family;

Mr. HAMMER, from December 5 to December 12, inclusive, on account of illness in family;

Mr. DOMINICK, for one week, on account of illness in his family; and

Mr. SHAW (at the request of Mr. BROOKS of Illinois), for an indefinite period, on account of illness in his family.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 11 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, December 6, 1921, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 6, 1921.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, with grateful hearts we approach Thy throne of grace this morning, recognizing that as the days are multiplied Thy mercies are more abundant unto us. The Lord cause His face to shine upon us and grant unto each of us such a sense of responsibility that we shall always live in Thy favor and in the fulfillment of duty's highest demands. Regard the President and all related to this great Government of ours, and may peace abound within our borders and unto the ends of the earth. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Vice President being absent, the President pro tempore (ALBERT B. CUMMINS, a Senator from the State of Iowa) took the chair.

KENNETH MCKELLAR, a Senator from the State of Tennessee; ROBERT N. STANFIELD, a Senator from the State of Oregon; and DAVID I. WALSH, a Senator from the State of Massachusetts, appeared in their seats to-day.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents a copy of a petition, the original of which was sent to the President of the United States, signed by some 700 citizens of Iowa, and asks that the petition itself, without the names, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Petition to the President, the Senate, and the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Whereas we believe that the conditions existing in Ireland are a menace to the peace of the world, and that the savage efforts of England, without protest by other civilized States, to repress representative government, are breeding disrespect for law and undermining the foundation of all organized government; and

Whereas we believe the highest and best interests of our country demand a free, prosperous, and peaceful republic in Ireland:

Therefore the undersigned, citizens of the United States, residing in the State of Iowa, respectfully petition the Congress of the United States to take the necessary action to bring about the recognition of the existing duly elected government of the republic of Ireland by the Government of the United States, in accordance with the traditional policy of our country faithfully adhered to since the early days of the Republic.

MARY A. MCDONALD,
110? Jefferson Street, Burlington, Iowa.

Mr. McLEAN presented a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the Connecticut Chamber of Commerce, of New Haven, Conn., protesting against removing the United States Naval Training School from Newport, R. I., which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Chamber of Commerce, favoring the Conference on Limitation of Armament to the end that it may lead the world toward permanent peace by the adjustment of international problems on a basis of cooperation and good will, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Woman's Home Missionary Society, Methodist Episcopal Church, of Altoona, Kans., requesting that the Government of the United States whole-heartedly enter the disarmament conference and ask for total abolition of war, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented a resolution adopted by the Fort Worth (Tex.) Art Association, favoring the plan of placing the governmental scientific bureaus at Washington under the jurisdiction of the Smithsonian Institution, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SMOOT presented letters in the nature of petitions from Milton Bennion, dean, school of education, University of Utah, of Salt Lake City, Utah, and Dr. Everett Monroe Ellison, of Washington, D. C., indorsing the plan of placing the governmental scientific bureaus under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

IRISH RESOLUTION EXPRESSING GRATITUDE.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a copy of a short resolution passed some months ago by the Dail Eireann, the legislative branch of the Irish republican government. The resolution expresses the appreciation and thanks of the Irish people for the assistance rendered by the American people in raising money to help the cause of freedom in Ireland. In view of what has appeared in the press this morning there is every prospect of a final and satisfactory peace settlement between the republican government of Ireland and the British Empire, and if this much to be desired adjustment of political differences is successful the resolution may have a historic interest in future years.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, we were unable to hear the request.

Mr. TRAMMELL. What is the request? There is so much confusion in the Chamber I did not understand the request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the resolution:

The reading clerk read as follows:

Copy of resolution of thanks to the American subscribers to the first loan of the Irish republic adopted by Dail Eireann on August 17, 1921.

Resolved, That we, the members of Dail Eireann, the duly elected parliament of the Irish republic, in public session assembled this 17th day of August, 1921, hereby tender the gratitude of the Irish nation to the people of the United States of America for the warm support they have always given to the cause of Ireland and particularly for their generous subscription to the first loan of the Irish government; and we furthermore declare that each bond certificate purchased in the United States will be redeemed in due course by the Irish nation.

EAMON DE VALERA, President.

AUGUST 17, 1921.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I should like to have an explanation as to the purport of the resolution before it passes over without objection. I could not understand its purport.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It is simply a request to have printed in the RECORD a statement of appreciation by the Irish republican government of assistance rendered in their struggle for independence by the people of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I wish to put the Senate on notice that we are making out in this country another Alabama claims case; that is exactly where we are drifting. We are encouraging in this country revolutionary movements against a Government with which we are at peace; we are encouraging the fitting out of another Alabama; we are allowing preparations to be made in this country to invade the integrity and the union of another country. We are drifting right up against another Alabama claims case, and Senators should be very careful, indeed, how much more of this we encourage or tolerate. Therefore, Mr. President, having made the point, and knowing that Senators understand it, I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 2124) to relinquish, release, remise, and quitclaim all right, title, and interest of the United States of America in and to all the lands contained within sections 17 and 20, township 3 south, range 1 west, St. Stephens meridian, Alabama (Rept. No. 325);

A bill (H. R. 6262) to add certain lands to Mount McKinley National Park, Alaska (Rept. No. 326); and

A bill (H. R. 7161) to authorize certain desert-land claimants who entered the military or naval service of the United States during the war with Germany to make final proof of their entries (Rept. No. 327).

Mr. SMOOT, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 486) to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands in Alaska, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 328) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each with amendments and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 77) for the consolidation of forest lands within the Clearwater, St. Joe, and Selway National Forests (Rept. No. 329); and

A bill (H. R. 3250) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to convey to Augustus S. Peabody certain land in Galveston County, Tex. (Rept. No. 330).

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5511) for the relief of John Cestnik, jr., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 331) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 2004) for the relief of the First International Bank of Sweetgrass, Mont., reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 332) thereon.

Mr. KENDRICK, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 2205) to add certain lands on the North Fork of the Shoshone River to the Shoshone National Forest (Rept. No. 333); and

A bill (H. R. 2914) to add certain lands to Minidoka National Forest (Rept. No. 334).

Mr. LENROOT, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendments and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 2468) providing for the sale and disposal of public lands within the area heretofore surveyed as Tenderfoot Lake, State of Wisconsin (Rept. No. 335);

A bill (H. R. 3116) validating homestead entry of Mike Campbell for certain public land in Alaska (Rept. No. 336); and

A bill (H. R. 6961) granting certain lands to the State of Alabama for the use of the Searcy Hospital for the Colored Insane (Rept. No. 337).

Mr. POINDEXTER, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 1452) providing for establishing shooting grounds for the public, for establishing game refuges and breeding grounds, for protecting migratory birds, and requiring a Federal license to hunt them (Rept. No. 338); and

A bill (H. R. 6864) authorizing exchanges of lands within the Rainier National Forest, in the State of Washington (Rept. No. 339).

Mr. BURSUM, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 726) for the relief of George Emerson, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (Rept. No. 340) thereon.

Mr. LADD, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7780) for the relief of G. Fred Roach and others, reported it without amendment.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 2774) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes,' approved June 3, 1916, and to establish military justice," approved June 4, 1920; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. McNARY:

A bill (S. 2775) to extend for one year the powers of the War Finance Corporation to make advances under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to amend the War Finance Corporation act, approved April 5, 1918, as amended, to provide relief for producers of and dealers in agricultural products, and for other purposes," approved August 24, 1921; to the Committee on Finance.

A bill (S. 2776) to authorize the construction of a toll bridge over the Columbia River at a point approximately 5 miles upstream from Dalles City, Wasco County, in the State of Oregon, to a point on the opposite shore of the State of Washington; to the Committee on Commerce.

A bill (S. 2777) granting a pension to Robert P. Gill; to the Committee on Pensions.

for other purposes," approved October 6, 1917, as amended; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 2781) providing for the appropriation of funds for acquiring additional water rights for Indians on the Crow Reservation, in Montana, whose lands are irrigable under the Two Leggins irrigation canal; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

A bill (S. 2782) granting a pension to George A. Atkinson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McCUMBER:

A bill (S. 2783) granting a pension to Gus Sweeney; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SPENCER:

A bill (S. 2784) for the relief of Mary Zgur (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 2785) to pension soldiers who were in the military service during Indian wars and disturbances, and the widows, minors, and helpless children of such soldiers; to increase the pensions of Indian war survivors and widows, and to amend section 2 of the act of March 4, 1917; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MOSES:

A bill (S. 2786) for the relief of Joseph Y. Dreisonstok; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 2787) for the relief of the Neah Bay Dock Co., a corporation; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. POINDEXTER:

A bill (S. 2788) to punish the storing of foodstuffs and other necessaries of life so as to affect the market price or limit the supply thereof, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. ELKINS:

A bill (S. 2789) granting a pension to William J. Smith; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. TRAMMELL:

A bill (S. 2790) to authorize the boards of county commissioners, Escambia and Santa Rosa Counties, Fla., their successors and assigns, to construct a bridge across the Escambia River, Fla., at or near Century, Fla., approximately 33 miles from the mouth of this river; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. FRANCE:

A bill (S. 2791) to assure to persons within the jurisdiction of every State the equal protection of the laws, and to punish the crime of lynching; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 138) authorizing the payment of the cost of transportation for certain supplies purchased by the Military Establishment; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO THE TARIFF BILL.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I submit four amendments to House bill No. 7456, known as the Fordney tariff bill. I will state that one of the amendments provides for the so-called American valuation in a different form from that provided in the House bill; another makes provision with reference to the depreciated currency of foreign countries; the third authorizes the President to increase and decrease duties in certain cases; and the fourth covers all three of the points I have indicated in a rather restricted way. I ask that the four amendments, in addition to being printed in the usual form, be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the amendments were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. SMOOT to the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes, viz: On page —, line —, insert the following:

"SEC. ——. That when, in his judgment, the public welfare may require, the President shall direct that investigation be made of the conditions affecting competition in the American market between foreign and domestic producers of any article or articles. In such investigation account shall be taken of the wholesale market price at which said articles are sold or freely offered for sale, the wages and other production costs which may appear, and any advantages of domestic and foreign producers in competitive trade. When the President shall find from such investigation that the duties fixed in this act do not equalize the advantages of competing domestic and foreign producers of any article or articles he shall proclaim a list of such articles, together with such changes in classification and such increase or decrease of the duties on any or all of the articles or, in case of advantages due to the depreciation of foreign currency, such variations in any duty or duties on similar articles, enumerated in said list as he finds will equalize such advantages; and when he shall find that by reason of the depreciation of foreign currency or by reason of uncertain conditions in the market of the country of origin of any article or articles enumerated in such list the value in the market of such country is not a stable basis for the assessment of duties, he may direct and proclaim that any ad valorem duty or any duty based in whole or in part on value levied upon such article or articles shall be assessed upon the wholesale selling price of such or similar products in the principal market or markets of the United States at the time of importation of the imported merchandise; and 30 days after the date of such proclamation such changes in classification or variation in any duties or in the basis of assessment shall take effect and such increased or decreased duties shall be levied, collected, and paid on such articles when imported directly or otherwise from the country of origin into the United States: Provided, That the total increase or decrease of such duties shall not exceed 50 per cent of the duties fixed in this act until further provided by law. The President may at any time by proclamation modify or revoke any such prior proclamation in whole or in part."

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. SMOOT to the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes, namely, on page —, line —, insert the following:

"SEC. ——. That in the case of merchandise which is subject to an ad valoreum duty or to a duty based upon or regulated in any manner by the value thereof, if the President shall find by reason of the depreciation of the currency or other unstable conditions in the country of origin of such merchandise that value, as defined in section 402, Title IV, of this act is not a certain basis for the assessment of duties, he may direct and proclaim that any ad valorem rate of duty or any duty based upon or regulated in any manner by the value of such merchandise shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the wholesale selling price of such or similar products in the principal market or markets of the United States at the time of exportation of the imported merchandise: Provided, however, That in such cases said duties may be increased or decreased in accordance with section 1, and 30 days after the date of said proclamation such imported merchandise shall be thus valued for the purpose of the assessment of duties."

(Note.—This section will be applicable only in case Congress restores in sec. 402, Title IV, the foreign market value as the basis for the assessment of ad valorem duties.)

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. SMOOT to the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes, viz, on page ——, line ——, insert the following:

"SEC. 2. That in the case of dutiable merchandise which is imported, directly or otherwise, from a country whose currency has depreciated more than 5 per cent from the value of the pure metal of its standard coin, if the President shall find that competitive advantages are accruing to producers in such countries because of such depreciation, he shall determine the duties which will respectively equalize such competitive advantages and shall proclaim a list of products thus affected and such respective equalizing duties applicable thereto, and 30 days after the date of such proclamation there shall be levied, collected, and paid in addition to the duties otherwise provided such equalizing duties, not exceeding 50 per cent of the value of the respective imported articles; that the President may, in determining such equalizing duties, take into account prices at which such or similar products are sold in the United States and competing foreign countries, wages, prices of materials, and other items in the costs of production of such or similar products in the United States and competing foreign countries, and any advantages of domestic and foreign producers in competitive trade: Provided, That the President may modify such equalizing duties or remove products from said list when he shall determine that the competitive advantages have changed or no longer exist which led to the inclusion of such products in said list."

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. SMOOT to the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes, viz, on page ——, line ——, insert the following:

"SEC. 1. That it shall be the duty of the President to ascertain differences in conditions of competition in trade of such or similar products in the United States and competing foreign countries which will enable him to find what rates of duty upon imported merchandise will equalize any differences which he may find to exist in favor of foreign producers in marketing such products in the United States; that in determining such differences the President may take into account prices at which such or similar products are sold in the United States and competing foreign countries, wages, prices of materials, and other items in costs of production of such or similar products in the United States and competing foreign countries, and any advantages of domestic and foreign producers in competitive trade; that upon the ascertainment of such information the President may proclaim any changes in classification provided for in this act or such increases or decreases in any rate of duty as he shall determine will equalize such differences in the markets of the United States, and 30 days after the date of such proclamation all such changes in classification shall take effect, and all such increased or decreased rates of duty shall be levied, collected, and paid: Provided, That the total increase or decrease of such rates shall not exceed 50 per cent of the rates provided in this act until further provided by law."

PROTECTION OF MIGRATORY BIRDS.

Mr. SPENCER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1452) providing for establishing shooting grounds for the public, for establishing game refuges and breeding grounds, for protecting migratory birds, and requiring a Federal license to hunt them, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys and ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE RED RIVER OF THE NORTH.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 8744) granting the consent of Congress to the State of North Dakota, the county of Cass, and the city of Fargo, N. Dak., and the State of Minnesota, the county of Clay, and the city of Moorhead, Minn., or any of them, to construct a bridge across the Red River of the North between the cities of Fargo, N. Dak., and Moorhead, Minn., which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MYERS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $9,819 to pay Katherine Macdonald, of Butte, Mont., on account of unpaid claims held by her for work and services performed on or supplies furnished for the construction of the Corbett Tunnel, a part of the Shoshone reclamation project in the State of Wyoming, intended to be proposed by him to House bill 9237, the deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CULBERSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 9237, the deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On page 27, after line 25, insert a new paragraph:

UNEXPENDED BALANCES.

The unexpended balances of the appropriations chargeable with the settlement of claims resulting from the suspension or termination of contracts or other procurement obligations of the War Department consequent upon the suspension of hostilities and with the adjustment of claims under the act entitled "An act to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1919, as provided in the second deficiency act, fiscal year 1921, are hereby made available until June 30, 1922, for the payment of any award made by the Secretary of War under the act entitled "An act to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1919, without reference to the purpose of the original appropriations from which the said unexpended balances are taken.

ADDITIONAL CLERK, COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BALL submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 182), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That Senate resolution No. 68, agreed to May 31, 1921, authorizing the Committee on the District of Columbia to employ an additional clerk at the rate of $1,600 per annum, to be paid out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, be, and it hereby is, renewed to continue in full force and effect from December 1, 1921, until the end of the Sixty-seventh Congress.

CLERICAL SERVICE IN PORTO RICO.

Mr. KING. I submit a resolution which I ask may lie on the table for the present. I shall call it up at a later day.

The resolution (S. Res. 183) was ordered to lie on the table as follows:

Whereas it is claimed that since Porto Rico was acquired by the United States an inordinately large proportion of the officials and clerical personnel of the territorial and of the local governments have been persons who went to Porto Rico from the United States in order to occupy such positions, and that since March 4, 1921, a large additional number of persons have gone from the United States to Porto Rico to fill various official positions in the territorial and local governments, and that such condition is a cause of complaint of dissatisfaction in the island: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of War is directed to report to the Senate a complete list of the number of persons holding positions in the territorial government and local governments, including the clerical personnel on the 4th of March, 1921, who were not natives of Porto Rico, and also a complete list of the persons who have, since March 4, 1921, been appointed to positions, including clerical personnel, in the territorial government and local governments, who are not natives of Porto Rico.

ADJUSTMENT OF FOREIGN LOANS (S. DOC. NO. 86).

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a public document the confidential print with reference to foreign loans and authority for making the same. The confidence has been removed. There were only 96 copies printed for the use of the Senate, and many Senators find themselves without copies. There is quite a little demand for the document, and I think since it has been made public we might have it printed as a public document so that Members of Congress may have it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The order was reduced to writing, as follows:

Ordered, That the hearing before the Committee on the Judiciary, United States Senate, Sixty-seventh Congress, first session, relative to foreign loans and authority for making same be printed as a public document.

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (at 12 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.). In pursuance of the concurrent resolution adopted by the Senate yesterday, the Senate will now proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives to receive a communication from the President of the United States.

Thereupon the Senate, preceded by its Sergeant at Arms (David S. Barry) and headed by the President pro tempore and the Secretary (George A. Sanderson) proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives.

ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The address of the President of the United States this day delivered at a joint meeting of the two Houses of Congress is as follows:

MR. SPEAKER AND MEMBERS OF THE CONGRESS: It is a very gratifying privilege to come to the Congress with the Republic at peace with all the nations of the world. More, it is equally gratifying to report that our country is not only free from every impending menace of war, but there are growing assurances of the permanency of the peace which we so deeply cherish.

For approximately ten years we have dwelt amid menaces of war or as participants in war's actualities, and the inevitable aftermath, with its disordered conditions, has added to the difficulties of government which adequately can not be appraised except by those who are in immediate contact and know the responsibilities. Our tasks would be less difficult if we had only ourselves to consider, but so much of the world was involved, the disordered conditions are so well-nigh universal, even among nations not engaged in actual warfare, that no permanent readjustments can be effected without consideration of our inescapable relationship to world affairs in finance and trade. Indeed, we should be unworthy of our best traditions if we were unmindful of social, moral, and political conditions which are not of direct concern to us, but which do appeal to the human sympathies and the very becoming interest of a people blest with our national good fortune.

It is not my purpose to bring to you a program of world restoration. In the main such a program must be worked out by the nations more directly concerned. They must themselves turn to the heroic remedies for the menacing conditions under which they are struggling, then we can help, and we mean to help. We shall do so unselfishly because there is compensation in the consciousness of assisting, selfishly because the commerce and international exchanges in trade, which marked our high tide of fortunate advancement, are possible only when the nations of all continents are restored to stable order and normal relationship.

In the main the contribution of this Republic to restored normalcy in the world must come through the initiative of the executive branch of the Government, but the best of intentions and most carefully considered purposes would fail utterly if the sanction and the cooperation of Congress were not cheerfully accorded.

I am very sure we shall have no conflict of opinion about constitutional duties or authority. During the anxieties of war, when necessity seemed compelling, there were excessive grants of authority and an extraordinary concentration of powers in the Chief Executive. The repeal of war-time legislation and the automatic expirations which attended the peace proclamations have put an end to these emergency excesses, but I have the wish to go further than that. I want to join you in restoring, in the most cordial way, the spirit of coordination and cooperation, and that mutuality of confidence and respect which is necessary in representative popular government.

Encroachment upon the functions of Congress or attempted dictation of its policy are not to be thought of, much less attempted, but there is an insistent call for harmony of purpose and concord of action to speed the solution of the difficult problems confronting both the legislative and executive branches of the Government.

It is worth while to make allusion here to the character of our Government, mindful as one must be that an address to you is no less a message to all our people, for whom you speak most intimately. Ours is a popular Government through political parties. We divide along political lines, and I would ever have it so. I do not mean that partisan preferences should hinder any public servant in the performance of a conscientious and patriotic official duty. We saw partisan lines utterly obliterated when war imperiled, and our faith in the Republic was riveted anew. We ought not to find these partisan lines obstructing the expeditious solution of the urgent problems of peace.

Granting that we are fundamentally a representative popular Government, with political parties the governing agencies, I believe the political party in power should assume responsibility, determine upon policies in the conference which supplements conventions and election campaigns, and then strive for achievement through adherence to the accepted policy.

There is vastly greater security, immensely more of the national viewpoint, much larger and prompter accomplishment where our divisions are along party lines, in the broader and loftier sense, than to divide geographically, or according to pursuits, or personal following. For a century and a third parties have been charged with responsibility and held to strict accounting. When they fail, they are relieved of authority; and the system has brought us to a national eminence no less than a world example.

Necessarily legislation is a matter of compromise. The full ideal is seldom attained. In that meeting of minds necessary to insure results, there must and will be accommodations and compromises, but in the estimate of convictions and sincere purposes the supreme responsibility to national interest must not be ignored. The shield to the high-minded public servant who adheres to party policy is manifest, but the higher purpose is the good of the Republic as a whole.

It would be ungracious to withhold acknowledgment of the really large volume and excellent quality of work accomplished by the extraordinary session of Congress which so recently adjourned. I am not unmindful of the very difficult tasks with which you were called to deal, and no one can ignore the insistent conditions which, during recent years, have called for the continued and almost exclusive attention of your membership to public work. It would suggest insincerity if I expressed complete accord with every expression recorded in your roll calls, but we are all agreed about the difficulties and the inevitable divergence of opinion in seeking the reduction, amelioration, and readjustment of the burdens of taxation. Later on, when other problems are solved, I shall make some recommendations about renewed consideration of our tax program, but for the immediate time before us we must be content with the billion dollar reduction in the tax draft upon the people, and diminished irritations, banished uncertainty, and improved methods of collection. By your sustainment of the rigid economies already inaugurated, with hoped-for extension of these economies and added efficiencies in administration, I believe further reductions may be enacted and hindering burdens abolished.

In these urgent economies we shall be immensely assisted by the budget system for which you made provision in the extraordinary session. The first budget is before you. Its preparation is a signal achievement, and the perfection of the system, a thing impossible in the few months available for its initial trial, will mark its enactment as the beginning of the greatest reformation in governmental practices since the beginning of the Republic.

There is pending a grant of authority to the administrative branch of the Government for the funding and settlement of our vast foreign loans growing out of our grant of war credits. With the hands of the executive branch held impotent to deal with these debts we are hindering urgent readjustments among our debtors and accomplishing nothing for ourselves. I think it is fair for the Congress to assume that the executive branch of the Government would adopt no major policy in dealing with these matters which would conflict with the purpose of Congress in authorizing the loans, certainly not without asking congressional approval, but there are minor problems incident to prudent loan transactions and the safeguarding of our interests which can not even be attempted without this authorization. It will be helpful to ourselves and it will improve conditions among our debtors if funding and the settlement of defaulted interest may be negotiated.

The previous Congress, deeply concerned in behalf of our merchant marine, in 1920 enacted the existing shipping law, designed for the upbuilding of the American merchant marine. Among other things provided to encourage our shipping on the world's seas, the Executive was directed to give notice of the termination of all existing commercial treaties in order to admit of reduced duties on imports carried in American bottoms. During the life of the act no Executive has complied with this order of the Congress. When the present administration came into responsibility it began an early inquiry into the failure to execute the expressed purpose of the Jones Act. Only one conclusion has been possible. Frankly, Members of House and Senate, eager as I am to join you in the making of an American merchant marine commensurate with our commerce, the denouncement of our commercial treaties would involve us in a chaos of trade relationships and add indescribably to the confusion of the already disordered commercial world. Our power to do so is not disputed, but power and ships, without comity of relationship, will not give us the expanded trade which is inseparably linked with a great merchant marine. Moreover, the applied reduction of duty, for which the treaty denouncements were necessary, encouraged only the carrying of dutiable imports to our shores, while the tonnage which unfurls the flag on the seas is both free and dutiable, and the cargoes which make a nation eminent in trade are outgoing rather than incoming.

It is not my thought to lay the problem before you in detail to-day. It is desired only to say to you that the executive branch of the Government, uninfluenced by the protest of any nation, for none has been made, is well convinced that your proposal, highly intended and heartily supported here, is so fraught with difficulties and so marked by tendencies to discourage trade expansion that I invite your tolerance of noncompliance for only a few weeks until a plan may be presented which contemplates no greater draft upon the Public Treasury, and which, though yet too crude to offer it to-day, gives such promise of expanding our merchant marine that it will argue its own approval. It is enough to say to-day that we are so possessed of ships and the American intention to establish a merchant marine is so unalterable that a plan of reimbursement, at no other cost than is contemplated in the existing act, will appeal to the pride and encourage the hope of all the American people.

There is before you the completion of the enactment of what has been termed a "permanent" tariff law, the word "permanent" being used to distinguish it from the emergency act which the Congress expedited early in the extraordinary session, and which is the law to-day. I can not too strongly urge an early completion of this necessary legislation. It is needed to stabilize our industry at home; it is essential to make more definite our trade relations abroad. More, it is vital to the preservation of many of our own industries which contribute so notably to the very lifeblood of our Nation.

There is now, and there always will be, a storm of conflicting opinion about any tariff revision. We can not go far wrong when we base our tariffs on the policy of preserving the productive activities which enhance employment and add to our national prosperity.

Again comes the reminder that we must not be unmindful of world conditions, that peoples are struggling for industrial rehabilitation, and that we can not dwell in industrial and commercial exclusion and at the same time do the just thing in aiding world reconstruction and readjustment. We do not seek a selfish aloofness, and we could not profit by it were it possible. We recognize the necessity of buying wherever we sell, and the permanency of trade lies in its acceptable exchanges. In our pursuit of markets we must give as well as receive. We can not sell to others who do not produce, nor can we buy unless we produce at home. Sensible of every obligation of humanity, commerce, and finance, linked as they are in the present world condition, it is not to be argued that we need destroy ourselves to be helpful to others. With all my heart I wish restoration to the peoples blighted by the awful World War, but the process of restoration does not lie in our acceptance of like conditions. It were better to remain on firm ground, strive for ample employment and high standards of wage at home, and point the way to balanced budgets, rigid economies, and resolute, efficient work as the necessary remedies to cure disaster.

Everything relating to trade, among ourselves and among nations, has been expanded, excessive, inflated, abnormal, and there is a madness in finance which no American policy alone will cure. We are a creditor Nation, not by normal processes but made so by war. It is not an unworthy selfishness to seek to save ourselves when the processes of that salvation are not only not denied to others but commended to them. We seek to undermine for others no industry by which they subsist; we are obligated to permit the undermining of none of our own which make for employment and maintained activities.

Every contemplation, it little matters in which direction one turns, magnifies the difficulty of tariff legislation, but the necessity of the revision is magnified with it. Doubtless we are justified in seeking a more flexible policy than we have provided heretofore. I hope a way will be found to make for flexibility and elasticity, so that rates may be adjusted to meet unusual and changing conditions which can not be accurately anticipated. There are problems incident to unfair practices, and to exchanges which madness in money have made almost unsolvable. I know of no manner in which to effect this flexibility other than the extension of the powers of the Tariff Commission, so that it can adapt itself to a scientific and wholly just administration of the law.

I am not unmindful of the constitutional difficulties. These can be met by giving authority to the Chief Executive, who could proclaim additional duties to meet conditions which the Congress may designate.

At this point I must disavow any desire to enlarge the Executive's powers or add to the responsibilities of the office. They are already too large. If there were any other plan I would prefer it.

The grant of authority to proclaim would necessarily bring the Tariff Commission into new and enlarged activities, because no Executive could discharge such a duty except upon the information acquired and recommendations made by this commission. But the plan is feasible, and the proper functioning of the board would give us a better administration of a defined policy than ever can be made possible by tariff duties prescribed without flexibility.

There is a manifest difference of opinion about the merits of American valuation. Many nations have adopted delivery valuation as the basis for collecting duties; that is, they take the cost of the imports delivered at the port of entry as the basis for levying duty. It is no radical departure, in view of varying conditions and the disordered state of money values, to provide for American valuation, but there can not be ignored the danger of such a valuation, brought to the level of our own production costs, making our tariffs prohibitive. It might do so in many instances where imports ought to be encouraged. I believe Congress ought well consider the desirability of the only promising alternative, namely, a provision authorizing proclaimed American valuation, under prescribed conditions, on any given list of articles imported.

In this proposed flexibility, authorizing increases to meet conditions so likely to change, there should also be provision for decreases. A rate may be just to-day and entirely out of proportion six months from to-day. If our tariffs are to be made equitable, and not necessarily burden our imports and hinder our trade abroad, frequent adjustment will be necessary for years to come. Knowing the impossibility of modification by act of Congress for any one or a score of lines without involving a long array of schedules, I think we shall go a long ways toward stabilization if there is recognition of the Tariff Commission's fitness to recommend urgent changes by proclamation.

I am sure about public opinion favoring the early determination of our tariff policy. There have been reassuring signs of a business revival from the deep slump which all the world has been experiencing. Our unemployment, which gave us deep concern only a few weeks ago, has grown encouragingly less, and new assurances and renewed confidence will attend the congressional declaration that American industry will be held secure.

Much has been said about the protective policy for ourselves making it impossible for our debtors to discharge their obligations to us. This is a contention not now pressing for decision. If we must choose between a people in idleness pressing for the payment of indebtedness, or a people resuming the normal ways of employment and carrying the credit, let us choose the latter. Sometimes we appraise largest the human ill most vivid in our minds. We have been giving, and are giving now, of our influence and appeals to minimize the likelihood of war and throw off the crushing burdens of armament. It is all very earnest, with a national soul impelling. But a people unemployed, and gaunt with hunger, face a situation quite as disheartening as war, and our greater obligation to-day is to do the Government's part toward resuming productivity and promoting fortunate and remunerative employment.

Something more than tariff protection is required by American agriculture. To the farmer has come the earlier and the heavier burdens of readjustment. There is actual depression in our agricultural industry, while agricultural prosperity is absolutely essential to the general prosperity of the country.

Congress has sought very earnestly to provide relief. It has promptly given such temporary relief as has been possible, but the call is insistent for the permanent solution. It is inevitable that large crops lower the prices and short crops advance them. No legislation can cure that fundamental law. But there must be some economic solution for the excessive variation in returns for agricultural production.

It is rather shocking to be told, and to have the statement strongly supported, that 9,000,000 bales of cotton, raised on American plantations in a given year, will actually be worth more to the producers than 13,000,000 bales would have been. Equally shocking is the statement that 700,000,000 bushels of wheat, raised by American farmers, would bring them more money than a billion bushels. Yet these are not exaggerated statements. In a world where there are tens of millions who need food and clothing which they can not get, such a condition is sure to indict the social system which makes it possible.

In the main the remedy lies in distribution and marketing. Every proper encouragement should be given to the cooperative marketing programs. These have proven very helpful to the cooperating communities in Europe. In Russia the cooperative community has become the recognized bulwark of law and order, and saved individualism from engulfment in social paralysis. Ultimately they will be accredited with the salvation of the Russian State.

There is the appeal for this experiment. Why not try it? No one challenges the right of the farmer to a larger share of the consumer's pay for his product; no one disputes that we can not live without the farmer. He is justified in rebelling against the transportation cost. Given a fair return for his labor, he will have less occasion to appeal for financial aid; and given assurance that his labors shall not be in vain, we reassure all the people of a production sufficient to meet our national requirement and guard against disaster.

The base of the pyramid of civilization which rests upon the soil is shrinking through the drift of population from farm to city. For a generation we have been expressing more or less concern about this tendency. Economists have warned and statesmen have deplored. We thought for a time that modern conveniences and the more intimate contact would halt the movement, but it has gone steadily on. Perhaps only grim necessity will correct it, but we ought to find a less drastic remedy.

The existing scheme of adjusting freight rates has been favoring the basing points, until industries are attracted to some centers and repelled from others. A great volume of uneconomic and wasteful transportation has attended, and the cost increased accordingly. The grain-milling and meat-packing industries afford ample illustration, and the attending concentration is readily apparent. The menaces in concentration are not limited to the retarding influences on agriculture. Manifestly the conditions and terms of railway transportation ought not be permitted to increase this undesirable tendency. We have a just pride in our great cities, but we shall find a greater pride in the Nation, which has a larger distribution of its population in the country, where comparatively self-sufficient smaller communities may blend agricultural and manufacturing interests in harmonious helpfulness and enhanced good fortune. Such a movement contemplates no destruction of things wrought, of investments made, or wealth involved. It only looks to a general policy of transportation, of distributed industry, and of highway construction, to encourage the spread of our population and restore the proper balance between city and country. The problem may well have your earnest attention.

It has been perhaps the proudest claim of our American civilization that in dealing with human relationships it has constantly moved toward such justice in distributing the product of human energy that it has improved continuously the economic status of the mass of people. Ours has been a highly productive social organization. On the way up from the elemental stages of society we have eliminated slavery and serfdom and are now far on the way to the elimination of poverty.

Through the eradication of illiteracy and the diffusion of education mankind has reached a stage where we may fairly say that in the United States equality of opportunity has been attained, though all are not prepared to embrace it. There is, indeed, a too great divergence between the economic conditions of the most and the least favored classes in the community. But even that divergence has now come to the point where we bracket the very poor and the very rich together as the least fortunate classes. Our efforts may well be directed to improving the status of both.

While this set of problems is commonly comprehended under the general phrase "Capital and labor," it is really vastly broader. It is a question of social and economic organization. Labor has become a large contributor, through its savings, to the stock of capital, while the people who own the largest individual aggregates of capital are themselves often hard and earnest laborers. Very often it is extremely difficult to draw the line of demarcation between the two groups; to determine whether a particular individual is entitled to be set down as laborer or as capitalist. In a very large proportion of cases he is both, and when he is both he is the most useful citizen.

The right of labor to organize is just as fundamental and necessary as is the right of capital to organize. The right of labor to negotiate, to deal with and solve its particular problems in an organized way, through its chosen agents, is just as essential as is the right of capital to organize, to maintain corporations, to limit the liabilities of stockholders. Indeed, we have come to recognize that the limited liability of the citizen as a member of a labor organization closely parallels the limitation of liability of the citizen as a stockholder in a corporation for profit. Along this line of reasoning we shall make the greatest progress toward solution of our problem of capital and labor.

In the case of the corporation which enjoys the privilege of limited liability of stockholders, particularly when engaged in the public service, it is recognized that the outside public has a large concern which must be protected; and so we provide regulations, restrictions, and in some cases detailed supervision. Likewise in the case of labor organizations, we might well apply similar and equally well-defined principles of regulation and supervision in order to conserve the public's interests as affected by their operations.

Just as it is not desirable that a corporation shall be allowed to impose undue exactions upon the public, so it is not desirable that a labor organization shall be permitted to exact unfair terms of employment or subject the public to actual distresses in order to enforce its terms. Finally, just as we are earnestly seeking for procedures whereby to adjust and settle political differences between nations without resort to war, so we may well look about for means to settle the differences between organized capital and organized labor without resort to those forms of warfare which we recognize under the name of strikes, lockouts, boycotts, and the like.

As we have great bodies of law carefully regulating the organization and operations of industrial and financial corporations, as we have treaties and compacts among nations which look to the settlement of differences without the necessity of conflict in arms, so we might well have plans of conference, of common counsel, of mediation, arbitration, and judicial determination in controversies between labor and capital. To accomplish this would involve the necessity to develop a thoroughgoing code of practice in dealing with such affairs. It might be well to frankly set forth the superior interest of the community as a whole to either the labor group or the capital group. With rights, privileges, immunities, and modes of organization thus carefully defined, it should be possible to set up judicial or quasi judicial tribunals for the consideration and determination of all disputes which menace the public welfare.

In an industrial society such as ours the strike, the lockout, and the boycott are as much out of place and as disastrous in their results as is war or armed revolution in the domain of politics. The same disposition to reasonableness, to conciliation, to recognition of the other side's point of view, the same provision of fair and recognized tribunals and processes, ought to make it possible to solve the one set of questions as easily as the other. I believe the solution is possible.

The consideration of such a policy would necessitate the exercise of care and deliberation in the construction of a code and a charter of elemental rights, dealing with the relations of employer and employee. This foundation in the law, dealing with the modern conditions of social and economic life, would hasten the building of the temple of peace in industry which a rejoicing nation would acclaim.

After each war, until the last, the Government has been enabled to give homes to its returned soldiers, and a large part of our settlement and development has attended this generous provision of land for the Nation's defenders.

There is yet unreserved approximately 200,000,000 acres in the public domain, 20,000,000 acres of which are known to be susceptible of reclamation and made fit for homes by provision for irrigation.

The Government has been assisting in the development of its remaining lands, until the estimated increase in land values in the irrigated sections is full $500,000,000, and the crops of 1920 alone on these lands are estimated to exceed $100,000,000. Under the law authorizing these expenditures for development the advances are to be returned, and it would be good business for the Government to provide for the reclamation of the remaining 20,000,000 acres, in addition to expediting the completion of projects long under way.

Under what is known as the coal and gas lease law, applicable also to deposits of phosphates and other minerals on the public domain, leases are now being made on the royalty basis, and are producing large revenues to the Government. Under this legislation, 10 per cent of all royalties is to be paid directly to the Federal Treasury, and of the remainder 50 per cent is to be used for reclamation of arid lands by irrigation, and 40 per cent is to be paid to the States, in which the operations are located, to be used by them for school and road purposes.

These resources are so vast, and the development is affording so reliable a basis of estimate, that the Interior Department expresses the belief that ultimately the present law will add in royalties and payments to the treasuries of the Federal Government and the States containing these public lands a total of $12,000,000,000. This means, of course, an added wealth of many times that sum. These prospects seem to afford every justification of Government advances in reclamation and irrigation.

Contemplating the inevitable and desirable increase of population, there is another phase of reclamation full worthy of consideration. There are 79,000,000 acres of swamp and cut-over lands which may be reclaimed and made as valuable as any farm lands we possess. These acres are largely located in southern States, and the greater proportion is owned by the States or by private citizens. Congress has a report of the survey of this field for reclamation, and the feasibility is established. I gladly commend Federal aid, by way of advances, where State and private participation is assured.

Home making is one of the greater benefits which government can bestow. Measures are pending embodying this sound policy to which we may well adhere. It is easily possible to make available permanent homes which will provide, in turn, for prosperous American families, without injurious competition with established activities, or imposition on wealth already acquired.

While we are thinking of promoting the fortunes of our own people I am sure there is room in the sympathetic thought of America for fellow human beings who are suffering and dying of starvation in Russia. A severe drought in the Valley of the Volga has plunged 15,000,000 people into grievous famine. Our voluntary agencies are exerting themselves to the utmost to save the lives of children in this area, but it is now evident that unless relief is afforded the loss of life will extend into many millions. America can not be deaf to such a call as that.

We do not recognize the government of Russia, nor tolerate the propaganda which emanates therefrom, but we do not forget the traditions of Russian friendship. We may put aside our consideration of all international politics and fundamental differences in government. The big thing is the call of the suffering and the dying. Unreservedly I recommend the appropriation necessary to supply the American Relief Administration with 10,000,000 bushels of corn and 1,000,000 bushels of seed grains, not alone to halt the wave of death through starvation, but to enable spring planting in areas where the seed grains have been exhausted temporarily to stem starvation.

The American Relief Administration is directed in Russia by former officers of our own armies, and has fully demonstrated its ability to transport and distribute relief through American hands without hindrance or loss. The time has come to add the Government's support to the wonderful relief already wrought out of the generosity of the American private purse.

I am not unaware that we have suffering and privation at home. When it exceeds the capacity for the relief within the States concerned, it will have Federal consideration. It seems to me we should be indifferent to our own heart promptings, and out of accord with the spirit which acclaims the Christmastide, if we do not give out of our national abundance to lighten this burden of woe upon a people blameless and helpless in famine's peril.

There are a full score of topics concerning which it would be becoming to address you, and on which I hope to make report at a later time. I have alluded to the things requiring your earlier attention. However, I can not end this limited address without a suggested amendment to the organic law.

Many of us belong to that school of thought which is hesitant about altering the fundamental law. I think our tax problems, the tendency of wealth to seek nontaxable investment, and the menacing increase of public debt, Federal, State, and municipal—all justify a proposal to change the Constitution so as to end the issue of nontaxable bonds. No action can change the status of the many billions outstanding, but we can guard against future encouragement of capital's paralysis, while a halt in the growth of public indebtedness would be beneficial throughout our whole land.

Such a change in the Constitution must be very thoroughly considered before submission. There ought to be known what influence it will have on the inevitable refunding of our vast national debt, how it will operate on the necessary refunding of State and municipal debt, how the advantages of Nation over State and municipality, or the contrary, may be avoided. Clearly the States would not ratify to their own apparent disadvantage. I suggest the consideration because the drift of wealth into nontaxable securities is hindering the flow of large capital to our industries, manufacturing, agricultural, and carrying, until we are discouraging the very activities which make our wealth.

Agreeable to your expressed desire and in complete accord with the purposes of the executive branch of the Government, there is in Washington, as you happily know, an International Conference now most earnestly at work on plans for the limitation of armament, a naval holiday, and the just settlement of problems which might develop into causes of international disagreement.

It is easy to believe a world hope is centered on this Capital City. A most gratifying world accomplishment is not improbable.

The Senate returned to its Chamber at 1 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m., and the President pro tempore resumed the chair.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that the address of the President of the United States, just delivered in the House, be printed in the RECORD as a part of the Senate proceedings.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission transmitting, pursuant to law, a statement showing employment under appropriation for "Valuation of carriers" for the year ended June 30, 1921, the name of all persons employed, the State from which each was appointed, and the compensation paid to each, and also showing how the moneys appropriated for the fiscal years 1913 to 1921, inclusive, have been expended, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

EXCHANGE OF TYPEWRITING MACHINES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission transmitting, pursuant to law, a statement showing the make, model, and serial number of each machine exchanged during the fiscal year 1921, the period of its use, the allowance therefor, and the article, make, and model thereof, and price, including exchange value paid for each article procured through such exchange, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

JUDGMENTS OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS (S. DOC. NO. 87).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the chief clerk of the United States Court of Claims transmitting, pursuant to law, a statement of the judgments rendered by the court for the year ending December 3, 1921, the amount, the parties in whose favor rendered, and a brief synopsis of their nature, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

ADJUSTMENT OF FOREIGN LOANS.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the former Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, relating to the question of the refunding of the foreign debts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

NEW YORK, November 28, 1921.

MY DEAR SENATOR: My attention has been called to the statement of Mr. FORDNEY and Mr. LONGWORTH, in the debate on the bill to authorize refunding of our foreign loans (reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Oct. 21, 1921, pp. 7355 ff.), to the effect that the obligations taken by the Treasury from foreign Governments were not strictly in accordance with the Liberty loan acts pursuant to which these loans were made. This surprising statement is utterly without foundation, and was evidently made under a misapprehension of the law and the facts, or in forgetfulness of the record which they themselves helped to make.

The first Liberty bond act, section 2, authorized the purchase of "obligations" of foreign Governments bearing the same rate of interest and containing "in their essentials the same terms and conditions as those of the United States issued under the authority" of that act. The obligations issued by the United States under the authority of that act were of two classes, Liberty bonds, section 1, and Treasury certificates of indebtedness, section 6. In the exercise of the discretion which the act thus gave, the Treasury purchased from foreign Governments certificates of indebtedness in preference to bonds. It, however, exacted from the foreign Governments an agreement to convert them into bonds at the option of the United States.

The Treasury's construction of the acts and its policy and procedure in this matter were from time to time fully and freely explained to the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate. Only one individual member of either committee ever voiced any criticism of it, though others made inquiries. Neither Mr. FORDNEY nor Mr. LONGWORTH, each of whom was a member of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, criticized or raised any objection. The committees and Congress, far from registering any protest or making any objection to the Treasury's construction of the acts under which it was proceeding or to its policy and practice in the matter, in every instance, with unanimity or substantial unanimity, registered their approval and confidence in the Treasury by confirming and extending the authority conferred upon the Treasury under the various and successive Liberty loan acts.

The following are extracts from the testimony before the Ways and Means Committee (Mr. FORDNEY being present) at the hearing on the second Liberty loan bill, August 28 and 29, 1917, pages 10 and 11:

"Secretary MCADOO. We have made loans to the foreign Governments thus far on short-time or demand obligations similar in form to the Treasury certificates of indebtedness issued by our own Government, and these obligations will be in due course converted into bonds of the same maturity as the Liberty bonds. I am suggesting provisions which will give us a little freer hand in determining the form of these obligations. I do not think it wise to have the Government of the United States tied so securely to a provision similar to that in the first bill. That makes it necessary ultimately to take their obligations of substantially the same form and maturities that we issue to our own people. Our experience thus far has convinced us that we ought not to be tied in that way. We ought to have a freer hand in determining not only the maturities of the loans that we make to them but also in determining the substance and general character of the obligations that we shall take from them.

"Mr. MOORE. Are those foreign securities brought here by the foreign commissioners?

"Secretary MCADOO. These loans are made always with the representative of the country; that is, the representative authorized to act for the foreign Government, generally the ambassador or minister.

"Mr. MOORE. Would you care to suggest the method by which the United States is protected by the actual control of these obligations?

"Secretary MCADOO. We take the obligations of those Governments in due form in each instance. They are the obligations of the Government concerned to pay back to us the amount of money advanced to it.

"Mr. MOORE. They are preparatory to the delivery of their bonds?

"Secretary MCADOO. They are short time or demand obligations, which will be converted into bonds.

"Mr. MOORE. And they remain in the Treasury Department here at Washington?

"Secretary MCADOO. Yes, sir.

"Mr. MOORE. It is not done through the Federal reserve bank?

"Secretary MCADOO. No, sir. In other words, for every dollar of loans that we have made to those Governments we have in the Treasury of the United States their obligations, duly executed by their representatives. In the case of each Government, the Secretary of the Treasury first receives assurances from our own State Department as to the authority of the foreign representative to execute the obligations on behalf of his Government.

"Mr. MOORE. It is really a condition precedent to the final delivery?

"Secretary MCADOO. While it is a demand loan at the moment, it will be converted into a long-time bond in due course."

(P. 64.)

"Mr. HELVERING. Mr. Secretary, how long will these obligations be carried as demand paper in the Treasury?

"Secretary MCADOO. Only until such time as we can prepare the definite obligations, as we call them, fixing the maturity. The obligations of the foreign Governments thus far taken, gentlemen, must ultimately have the same maturities and be in substance, in their terms, etc., like the obligations the United States has issued to its own people (in the first Liberty loan). Now, with respect to future obligations, I think we ought to have more latitude for the reasons I have already explained to you. Up to the present time we have not converted the short-time demand obligations of these Governments into definite obligations of substantially the same character as the Liberty bonds we have just issued. That is due solely to the fact that there has been so much else to do that we have not had time to think out the denominations, etc., we should like to have these foreign obligations bear; but at any moment they are prepared to convert these demand obligations into the definitive bonds of substantially the same character as the Liberty loan bonds.

"Mr. HELVERING. You will not wait for that until the close of the war?

"Secretary MCADOO. No; it will be done in due course. I have a copy of the obligation here. It is signed for the Government by its duly authorized representative in this country.

"Mr. MOORE. That answers the question of yesterday."

The original intention of the Treasury (having taken certificates of indebtedness or short-time obligations in the first instance) was to convert them promptly from time to time into long-time obligations. But with the progress of the war and the developments of experience the Treasury became convinced that it was unwise and inexpedient to do so until the conclusion of peace.

The matter was dealt with in the second Liberty bond act, approved September 24, 1917. This act is a ratification of the action of the Treasury in taking "short-time obligations of foreign Governments" and enlarged the power and discretion of the Secretary by providing (sec. 3) "that the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, from time to time, to exercise in respect to any short-time obligations of foreign Governments acquired under authority of this (second Liberty bond) act, or of said act (first Liberty bond act) approved April 24, 1917, any privilege of conversion into obligations bearing interest at a higher rate provided for in or pursuant to "said acts," and to convert any short-time obligation of foreign Governments which may have been purchased under authority of "said first and second Liberty bond acts into long-time obligations of such foreign Governments," etc.

The matter was also explained to the Finance Committee of the Senate at the hearing on the second Liberty loan bill, September 11, 1917 (p. 29):

"Senator SMOOT. I want to ask if the Treasury Department now has any short-time obligations of foreign Governments?

"Secretary MCADOO. Yes, sir.

"Senator SMOOT. In what shape are they?

"Secretary MCADOO. Senator, they are like our own short-time obligations of indebtedness, the Treasury's own short-time obligations. I will say this, I notice a question was raised by Mr. COOPER in the House which was based, I think, upon a misconception as to what the power under the law is. We are to take from these foreign Governments obligations which in their essentials are the same as those we issue to our own people. We wished to finance them temporarily until we could sell Liberty bonds, just as we did ourselves, and, of course, the short-time certificates of indebtedness and the long-time Liberty bonds are available not only for our own financing but for the foreign loans, so that we took back the obligations of the powers in their essence the same as the short-time obligations we issued to our own people, with a provision that those short-time obligations should be converted into longer-time obligations upon demand when we issued our Liberty bonds. In substance, that is what it is. I preferred to get the obligations of the foreign Governments in the form in which we could determine more definitely just what kind of denominations or what forms we should require them to convert these bonds into ultimately. In other words, we ought to be in a position to require them at any time to not only convert their obligations into higher interest-bearing obligations if we issue such obligations, but also to deliver such denominations as we thought desirable in lieu of a single denomination.

"I am satisfied that any lawyer would say that the obligations I have taken from these foreign Governments comply strictly with the requirements of the act.

"Senator SMOOT. The reason I asked the question was because I stated that we had short-time obligations of foreign Governments and it was denied, and I based my statement upon no knowledge that I had received from the departments, but upon the fact that I knew money had been advanced to England before ever the bonds could have been engraved, or before it was possible to receive them from England.

"Secretary MCADOO. Of course. We do not have to take an engraved bond. If we take the obligations of the Government in writing it is just as good.

"(The committee thereupon went into executive session.)"

The second Liberty bond act (passed unanimously by the Congress after these statements to the House and Senate committees) gave the Treasury the desired freer hand in determining the form of the foreign Government obligations. Where the first Liberty bond act required that the foreign Government obligations should bear the same rate of interest and contain the same terms and conditions as the obligations of the United States, the second Liberty bond act (sec. 2) required only that the maturity should not be later than the maturity of the last issue of Liberty bonds and that the interest rate should not be less than the highest rate borne by any Liberty bonds. The second Liberty bond act also gave authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to convert the short-time obligations acquired under either the first or second act into long-time obligations in accordance with his announced intention at the hearings.

The second Liberty bond act appropriated $4,000,000,000 for the purchase of obligations of foreign Governments in addition to the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $3,000,000,000 carried by the first Liberty bond act.

The third Liberty bond act increased the appropriation from $4,000,000,000 to $5,500,000,000. It was further increased by the fourth Liberty bond act to $7,000,000,000. As stated by the Committee on Ways and Means, reporting to the House on the fourth Liberty bond bill, the appropriations under the war bond acts for the purpose of extending credit to our allies have been as follows:

First Liberty bond act	$3,000,000,000
Second Liberty bond act	4,000,000,000
Third Liberty bond act	1,500,000,000
Proposed bill	1,500,000,000
Total	10,000,000,000

The following is an extract from the testimony of Mr. Leffingwell, then Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, before the Ways and Means Committee at the hearing on the fourth Liberty bond bill on June 27, 1918, at which both Mr. FORDNEY and Mr. LONGWORTH were present (p. 17):

"Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Leffingwell, what have you to say about the progress of exchanging the short-time for long-time securities of the Allies to whom we have made loans?

"Mr. LEFFINGWELL. The exchange of our short-time obligations?

"Mr. SLOAN. No; that is, you took short-time obligations, I understand, but the exchange of those for the long-time obligations were to conform with the long-time obligations that we were issuing in this country.

"Mr. LEFFINGWELL. You will recall that in connection with the second bond bill Congress authorized the Secretary to take short-time obligations and to convert them into long-time obligations. They have not been converted. The Secretary does not at the present time wish to convert them, for he does not think it wise to convert them into long-time obligations. The situation changes from day to day, and what maturities ought to be given to the long-time obligations is a matter which can not be advantageously determined now."

The following is an extract from the testimony of Mr. Rathbone, then Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, at the hearing on the fifth or Victory Liberty loan bill before the Ways and Means Committee, February 13, 1919 (pp. 45–47):

"Mr. SLOAN. The Secretary, I believe, Mr. Rathbone, said you would say something about what was intended to be done with regard to converting the credits, the evidences of indebtedness, whatever you have down there, into long-time securities that it was at first contemplated should be taken from the foreign Governments. I do not know whether he intended you should go further in that than he did or not. If not, I do not desire to press it.

"Mr. RATHBONE. I can not go much further. What we have now are the certificates of indebtedness of those countries, agreeing, at our option, either to pay on demand, whenever we demand these amounts, or, at our option, to convert the same into long-time obligations. So that as we stand to-day we can do whatever we want; we can demand long-time obligations, which they are bound to give us, or technically we can demand the cash, which they are bound to give us.

"The CHAIRMAN. But which they can not give us.

"Mr. RATHBONE. Which they can not give us. And the question of funding those obligations, exercising our option and taking the long-time obligations, has been only informally discussed with the representatives of the Governments. They have all agreed in the position, which I think is absolutely correct, that they can tell better after the peace treaty is signed and they know what they are going to get in the way of indemnities and how they are going to get it, when they can pay the money. And as we hold the obligations, giving us an option to do whatever we want to do in the way of fixing the date for their maturity, it seems to us we are not sacrificing any interest in letting the final determination of that question await the determination of the indemnity question.

"The CHAIRMAN. As I understand it, you are getting certificates of indebtedness, or due bills, of those Governments at 5 per cent interest?

"Mr. RATHBONE. Yes.

"The CHAIRMAN. And if you were to fund them into bonds, you would get the same rate of interest which our bonds bear?

"Mr. RATHBONE. No; under the provisions of the law we can not fund those short-time obligations into long-time obligations bearing a less rate of interest than the short-time obligations.

"Mr. SLOAN. There are a number of reasons why I suggest this. Among others is the insistent demand recently of Mr. Clemenceau and the commissioners over there that we should pay our share of the war expenses from the beginning of the European war, which was pretty well understood as a definite hint or suggestion that we forgive this debt. The premier of Italy made the same suggestion. There have been insistent suggestions to this country that that debt be forgiven, or that we pay the cost of the war before we entered it, and all that. And I thought—have thought all along and think now—that there should be carried out our original purpose of putting it in a definite form, as the statute required, and which the previous law stated may be done and the people understood would be done—put into long-time obligations these loans and have it definitely settled, and not to be in hodgepodge the way we are now.

"Mr. RATHBONE. I am very glad you brought that point up. I can not agree with you that is hodgepodge. I should like to read a letter received from the French commissioner, dated February 5. He says:

"'MY DEAR MR. GLASS: The attention of my Government has been called to an article published recently in the Washington papers, according to which President Wilson is said to have been approached by French officials with the view of having the United States share the war expenditures of the Entente in the same proportion as if your Government had entered the war in August, 1914. The prime minister has cabled me in order to deny most emphatically that such a suggestion has ever been made to President Wilson by any French official.'

"There have been other articles seen in the newspapers here, which in one or two cases have been referred to informally in conversation with officials of foreign Governments, which they have always denied. They have always expressed the intention of their Governments to pay the indebtedness, and have said that they had no intention of doing anything else. It is true there have been one or two suggestions made here by statesmen, not holding any public office, that the debts should be forgiven. There is nobody under heaven who can forgive those debts except the Congress. The Treasury Department does not advocate and never has advocated anything but the collecting of those debts. And the statement that the foreign loans held by the Treasury Department are in a hodgepodge is wholly erroneous. I do not see how we could conceivably be in a better position than we are to-day, when we have their legal obligation and can demand the money or fix the terms and then the obligation can be converted into long-term obligations.

"Mr. HULL. In that connection a financial dispatch from London states that England is very greatly worried because we do hold their demand obligations, rather than their long-term obligations.

"Mr. SLOAN. But they have failed to follow the statute which Congress passed.

"Mr. RATHBONE. No; I think we have followed the statute which Congress passed. I think that the steps taken followed the first Liberty bond act, and I think the second Liberty bond act clears up any doubt which might have existed as to the meaning of the first act."

The Treasury did not, in connection with the Victory loan bill, ask for any increase in its appropriation for foreign loans, but did ask for certain additional authority in connection with the appropriations already granted. The Victory Liberty loan act conferred authority to extend credits to foreign Governments to provide for purchase by them of property owned by the United States Government or wheat the price of which had been guaranteed by the United States. The act expressly provided that the authority so conferred should not be deemed to prohibit the use of the present balance of the appropriation of $10,000,000,000 for the purposes of the second Liberty bond act. Section 8 of the Victory loan act provided that the long-time obligations of foreign Governments taken in exchange for short-time obligations acquired under the first Liberty bond act should mature not later than June 15, 1947, and all other long-time obligations should mature not later than October 15, 1938.

It is significant that the Victory loan act, which thus again, after full discussion, ratified what the Treasury had done and renewed and extended its authority, was passed three or four months after armistice day and after the Republican victory in the congressional election of 1918.

For further details concerning the form and terms of the certificates of indebtedness it is unnecessary to do more than quote from Secretary Houston's annual report for 1920, pages 55–57:

"For these advances the Treasury holds obligations in the form of certificates of indebtedness to the United States, payable as to principal and interest, without deduction for taxes of the debtor Government, in gold coin of the United States of the present standard of weight and fineness at the Subtreasury of the United States in New York or at the Treasury of the United States in Washington. Certain of them, at the option of the holder, are payable in the money of the debtor country; some at a fixed rate, and others at the buying rate for cable transfers of the currency of the debtor country in the New York market at noon on the day of demand as determined by the Federal Reserve Bank of New York. The certificates of indebtedness are signed in the name of the respective debtor Governments by representatives of such Governments designated to the Treasury by the Department of State as being authorized to sign them in the name and on behalf of the respective Governments.

"The earlier certificates were payable at fixed dates of maturity, all of which are now past, so that they are now held as demand obligations. They bore interest at various rates of interest from 3 per cent per annum upward. Those subsequently taken are payable on demand and bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent. By arrangement with the respective Governments substantially all the obligations have since May 15, 1918, borne interest at the rate of 5 per cent. The certificates of indebtedness are receivable in payment for bonds of the debtor Government or else are convertible into bonds in conformity with the provisions of the various Liberty bond acts in effect at the respective dates of the certificates of indebtedness. All the obligations are of the same general character. The following is a skeleton copy of an obligation received under the fourth Liberty bond act:

"CERTIFICATE OF INDEBTEDNESS $(AMOUNT IN FIGURES).

"The Government of (name of foreign Government), for value received, promises to pay to the United States of America, or assigns, the sum of (number of dollars in words) on demand, with interest from date hereof at the rate of (rate per cent) per cent per annum. Such principal sum and the interest thereon will be paid without deduction for any (name of foreign Government) taxes, present or future, in gold coin of the United States of America of the present standard of weight and fineness at the Subtreasury of the United States in New York, or, at the option of the holder, at the Treasury of the United States in Washington.

"This certificate will be converted by the Government of (name of foreign Government) if requested by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States of America at par with an adjustment of accrued interest into an equal par amount of (rate per cent) per cent convertible gold bonds of the Government of (name of foreign Government), conforming to the provisions of the acts of Congress of the United States known, respectively, as second Liberty bond act, third Liberty bond act, and fourth Liberty bond act. If bonds of the United States issued under authority of said acts shall be converted into other bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest than 4¼ per cent per annum, a proportionate part of the obligations of the Government of (name of foreign Government) of this series acquired by the United States under authority of said acts shall, at the request of said Secretary of the Treasury, be converted into obligations of said Government of (name of foreign Government) bearing interest at a rate exceeding that previously borne by this obligation by the same amount as the interest rate of the bonds of the United States issued upon such conversion exceeds the interest rate of (rate of this obligation) per cent, but not less than the highest rate of interest borne by such bonds of the United States.

"———— ————.

"(Signature of representative of foreign Government.)

"For the Government of (name of foreign Government).

"Dated the — day of ————."

To recapitulate:

1. The Treasury was authorized by the Liberty bond acts to issue bonds and certificates of indebtedness of the United States and to purchase bonds or certificates of indebtedness—short-time obligations—of foreign Governments. It purchased only the latter. In doing so it proceeded in accordance with the letter and spirit of the law and for the best interest of the United States.

2. The facts and procedure were fully explained to the Ways and Means Committee of the House and to the Finance Committee of the Senate in the summer of 1917, in the summer of 1918, and again in February, 1919. In no instance did those committees or Congress disapprove the Treasury's course. On the contrary, in each instance, Congress, upon the recommendation of those committees, extended the Treasury's authority and in effect ratified and confirmed what had been done.

3. The action of the Treasury in taking short-time obligations instead of long-time obligations was eminently wise, inasmuch as it placed the United States in a better position to fix terms and details of the long-time obligations upon conversion of the short-time obligations than could possibly have been the case if the Treasury had attempted to fix and determine those terms and conditions before the termination of the war and when it was impossible to foresee the needs and requirements of the United States and the conditions and possibilities of repayment by the foreign Governments.

4. The first Liberty bond act provided that any series of bonds issued by authority thereof should "be convertible into bonds bearing a higher rate of interest than the rate at which they were issued, if any subsequent issue of bonds should be issued at a higher rate of interest," and expressly required that any obligations of foreign Governments purchased thereunder should be converted into obligations bearing such increased rate of interest. This provision was adhered to in subsequent acts.

The uncertainty as to the rate of interest which future issues of Liberty bonds might bear, and which no human mind was prescient enough to resolve, made it highly desirable to purchase short-time obligations which could be easily converted into new obligations bearing the increased rate that Liberty bonds might bear, rather than to require foreign Governments to issue series of engraved bonds involving expense and long delays and absorbing labor and materials difficult to obtain and desperately needed for the conduct of the war.

In fact, the first imperative need of the Allies was money. Their credit in the United States had been exhausted, and they were faced with the stoppage of food supplies and munitions of war unless they could get immediate financial relief. Our purpose was to provide that relief quickly. If we had wasted time in haggling with the Allies over specific security for the loans we made to them, and if we had delayed the loans until bonds could be engraved and shipped across the Atlantic, the consequences would have been fatal—the Kaiser would have won the war.

Mr. LONGWORTH'S remarks betray a singular confusion of thought about these foreign loans. He seems to think that we have less "security" for the loans because they are short-time instead of long-time obligations. An engraved bond of long maturity issued by a government is no better secured than a certificate of indebtedness or a short-time obligation of a government. In each case the security is the good faith and credit of the obligor government. It was never expected that the nations fighting with us in the war could give specific security for each loan we made to them. They were in a death struggle, bleeding at every pore, and our purpose was to help them with money and not bleed them more. The United States got all the security for these loans that the debtor nations, our associates in the war, could give; and in lending money to them on their faith and credit the United States did exactly what private bankers have done since the conclusion of peace in placing loans for France and Belgium and other foreign nations in the New York market upon the faith and credit of those nations.

Mr. LONGWORTH also seems to have a curious idea that if the Treasury had taken "formal security" for the loans "the income of the Government would be enhanced." I do not know what he means by "formal security," but it is enough to say that all the security that it was possible to get for these loans to foreign Governments was obtained at the time by the Treasury, and that, no matter what form of obligation the Treasury took at the time, the payment of interest was not prejudiced thereby. If the debtor nations can not pay interest as it accrues on the short-time obligations—which by their very terms are convertible into long-time obligations at the option of the United States—by what possible magic could these nations pay the interest on their loans if they were in the form of long-time instead of short-time obligations?

In the course of the debate Mr. HUSTED asked Mr. LONGWORTH, "Does the gentleman think that a note of hand signed by an ambassador is the legal obligation of a foreign Government?"

Mr. LONGWORTH: "Of course it is not, and we could not possibly collect upon it in any legal procedure whatever."

This is sheer nonsense. In the first place, debts of nations can not be collected by "legal procedure." The sole dependence of a creditor is upon the good faith of the debtor nation, and if that nation refuses to pay, the only resort is to force, unless it is determined to acquiesce in the default. Mr. LONGWORTH is singularly ignorant of the laws governing international intercourse when he says that the obligation of a foreign nation, executed by its duly authorized ambassador or representative, is not legal. Every foreign obligation held by the Treasury is a legal and binding obligation of the nation executing it. No nation has questioned or can question the validity of its debt to the United States. What possible purpose can Mr. LONGWORTH have in questioning the validity of these debts against the interests of his own country?

There is no possible doubt about the validity of the foreign obligations purchased by the United States Treasury. The form and character of those obligations put the United States in the most advantageous possible position in dealing with its foreign debtors, because it enables the United States to deal with the whole question in the light of existing conditions and in such manner as the welfare of the American people demands. By the express terms of each and every foreign obligation taken by the Treasury the obligor government agrees, upon the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, to convert such obligation at par with an adjustment of accrued interest into an equal par amount of convertible gold bonds of the foreign Government, bearing a rate of interest and conforming in all respects to the provisions and requirements of the several Liberty bond acts passed by the Congress of the United States. What more could the United States have exacted?

Cordially, yours,

W. G. MCADOO.

Hon. CARTER GLASS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

RELIEF OF DISTRESS IN RUSSIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2708, Order of Business 323, found upon page 10 of the calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, the title of which will be stated by the Secretary for the information of the Senate.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2708) to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer without charge certain surplus material of the War Department to the American Relief Administration in Russia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia objects. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2708.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I suggest that the bill be read or explained.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If I have an opportunity, I shall be very glad to explain the bill. It is very simple.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I mean before we vote on the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names.

Ashurst	Harris	McLean	Spencer
Ball	Harrison	McNary	Stanfield
Broussard	Heflin	Moses	Stanley
Calder	Hitchcock	Myers	Sutherland
Caraway	Jones, Wash.	Nelson	Swanson
Cummins	Kellogg	Norbeck	Townsend
Curtis	Kendrick	Overman	Wadsworth
Dial	Keyes	Page	Walsh, Mass.
du Pont	King	Phipps	Walsh, Mont.
Edge	Ladd	Poindexter	Warren
Elkins	La Follette	Reed	Watson, Ga.
Ernst	Lenroot	Robinson	Watson, Ind.
Fletcher	Lodge	Sheppard	Weller
France	McCumber	Shortridge	Willis
Frelinghuysen	McKellar	Simmons
Glass	McKinley	Smoot

Mr. DIAL. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SMITH] is unavoidably detained. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] on account of illness.

Mr. HEFLIN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is absent on account of the death of his mother. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2708.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2708) to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer without charge certain surplus material of the War Department to the American Relief Administration in Russia, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

The Assistant Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to transfer without charge therefor to the American Relief Administration in Russia such medicines, medical and surgical supplies now on hand in the War Department, and for which there is now or for which hereafter there may be no further use in said department or in other executive departments of the Government, and for which, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, there may be no ready sale. As a condition of the transfer of such goods and materials, all the assembling, segregating, handling, packing, loading, and shipping thereof shall be undertaken and paid for by the American Relief Administration in Russia, so that the War Department shall be at no expense whatever in connection therewith.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments reported by the committee will be stated in their order.

The first amendment was, on page 1, line 5, after the word "such," to strike out "used clothing and footwear."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I object to that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I thought we were to have some explanation of the bill so that we might know the value of the property transferred and know what we are doing.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Just as soon as I can get recognition, I shall be very glad to make the explanation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York is recognized as being entitled to the floor.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the bill as originally introduced provided for the transfer not only of medicines and medical and surgical supplies but of used clothing and footwear and foodstuffs. On consultation with the Secretary of Commerce, who happens to be the head of the Russian Relief Administration, and with the Secretary of War, it was generally conceded that what little used clothing and footwear was in possession of the War Department was not needed by the Russian people. Furthermore, the War Department has no surplus foodstuffs on hand in quantities amounting to anything. It has practically cleaned up its vast stock of canned goods. That is all gone. The Secretary of Commerce told me personally that what they really needed, and what they would be more than satisfied with, was the gift of medicines and medical and surgical supplies. There is grave need of these things in the famine-stricken areas of Russia, and of these things the War Department has a considerable store, especially of disinfectants.

The diseases which accompany a condition of famine are contagious and infectious. Typhus is one of the fearful horrors that accompany famine. What the Russian people need most of all to-day in the matter of medical supplies, according to the information which reached the committee through Mr. Hoover, is disinfectants. The War Department accumulated a large quantity of disinfectants during the war. To-day there is no market for that material. They can not sell it profitably in the open market in this country, perhaps because a good deal of it is put up in containers which make it almost impossible to sell it in a retail way. The War Department tell the committee that they would be glad to give it away. They have it in storage. It costs money to the Government every day to hold it in storage. Mr. Hoover says that is what the Russians need more than anything else, except food, of course; hence this bill, amended as proposed, is before the Senate. It will cost the Government nothing and will bring great relief to a heavily stricken people.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, do I understand that in the distribution of these medicines and medical supplies the needs of the hospitals that we have established and are establishing for the relief of the ex-service men will not be interfered with?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator speak a little louder?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I was asking if this distribution of medicines and medical supplies—and I take it that that may include possibly surgical instruments, and so forth—will in any manner interfere with the furnishing of the necessary medical supplies for hospitals for our ex-service men, which hospitals have been established and are being established almost constantly.

I ask this question because recently I visited one of these hospitals that was established, as I understand, by the American Legion, aided by the State. They were asking the Government for certain surgical and medicinal supplies.

My question, therefore, I repeat: Will this action in any way deny our ex-service men the supplies which are necessary in our hospitals?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am quite certain that no such results can follow the enactment of this legislation. I call the attention of the Senator from Michigan to the language in the bill, commencing at the end of line 7, as follows:

And for which there is now, or for which hereafter there may be, no further use in said department or in other executive departments of the Government.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am not sure that the hospital I visited, the one at Camp Custer, is considered a Government institution now, but it has been established there for the relief of the ex-service men, and I know that they are asking for certain supplies of this kind. While I am in hearty sympathy with the object of the bill and want to aid in every way possible, I do feel that I do not wish to vote for any measure which would deny any proper care or attention to our own ex-service men.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am quite certain that it will not have that effect.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, we have just been put upon notice by the President that it is proposed, as a part of the official program, that millions of bushels of wheat and millions of bushels of corn shall be purchased by the Government and sent to Russia to feed those who need food in the famine-stricken districts. We ought to be extremely cautious in taking the first step, because the first step so easily leads to the second, and as we have been put on notice of what the second step is to be, we ought to attach more importance to this initial step.

We are put in the strange, anomalous, indefensible position, so far as my opinion is worth anything, of dealing with Russia apart from her Government. This Government is not dealing with the Russian Government. We are going over the heads of the Russian Government, refusing them recognition, acknowledging a debt of gratitude to the Russian Government, and yet refusing to acknowledge a Government which now maintains law and order, supports armies in the field, has a judicial system, has a post-office system, has a transportation system, has all of those various branches of interior administration which constitute a government.

We are refusing to recognize that Government because the form of it does not suit us. Yet we are the people who have laid down the doctrine, fought for it, and established it, that all just government rests upon the consent of the governed. It has been made manifest to the world that the present Government of Russia rests upon the consent of the governed. Indeed, Mr. President, it is but a modern adaptation of the old communal system, which is as old as Russia herself.

At any rate, Mr. President, it sustains itself. We are well aware of the fact that various attempts have been made from the outside to overthrow that Government. We all remember the movement led by Gen. Wrangel and the one led by Admiral Kolchak, and by various others who have attacked that Government from the outside. In every single case of the attempted imposition of foreign will upon the Russian people that attempt had been successfully resisted.

Do we not all remember how the home-rule instinct of the very nation to whose relief we went in the great World War maintained itself for 23 years against a combination of the kings who fought the democratic principles of the French Republic? It took a third attempt, Mr. President, to establish that Republic, an attempt made because of the instincts of the people in favor of their right to govern themselves according to their own convictions, their own will.

For several years this soviet government in Russia, in spite of the fact that the ship was stormtossed at every stage of the voyage, has successfully made passage. It is not now being attacked by any Government in the world. Poland attacked it and has ceased to do so. France attacked it and has ceased to do so. England bombarded Russian cities and was a party to those other attacks, but England has now made peaceful trade relations with Russia.

Therefore, Mr. President, it seems to me to put our Government in an awkward, unprecedented, indefensible position to say that we will not recognize their established form of government, but we, as a Government, will feed their people. Why not recognize that Government, and then deal with the Russian people through their Government?

What brought upon the Russians the calamities from which they are suffering? It was the blockade, which we ourselves, in conjunction with England, declared against that country. She could not send out goods; she could not bring in goods. Neither imports nor exports could she deal in. Hemmed in, cut off, isolated, Russia fell into a state of interior suffering.

We who come from the Southern States know something of the horrors of a blockade. We were reduced to suffering by that of the Civil War. I know how, when I was a boy, we used to resort to every conceivable kind of substitute for those comforts and those luxuries to which we had been accustomed before the blockade. I myself have drunk coffee made from parched potatoes, parched okra, and other substitutes. I myself have written upon the shabby, homemade paper, with the ink extracted from poke berries, writing with pens shaped from the quills of geese. In fact, that is the way I learned to write, because I learned while the guns were still booming on both sides. Therefore I can understand the condition of the Russian people. I profoundly sympathize with them in the sufferings brought upon them by that blockade. If we, Mr. President, should recognize the actual facts as they exist and open up relations with the Russian Government we would do more to supply their needs than we will by supplying all the medicine the War Department has, or by sending the few million bushels of corn and wheat that we can send to one Province. If we would let them into the family of nations they could take care of themselves, as they always did.

Do we not remember the day when the Russian fleet steamed into New York Harbor, during the Civil War, at the very time when England and France were about to recognize the belligerency of the Southern States, the Confederacy of the South? Did not the action of Russia at that time virtually say to England and France, "Do not interfere"? Mr. President, it is well known that the action of Russia at that crisis was of enormous moral benefit to the cause of the Union, not only in this country but throughout the world.

Now, when Russia, after years of travail of childbirth, has emerged into a stability which no outside attack can overthrow we refuse to recognize her Government, and thus we take the breath of life away from the Government and try to salve our own conscience by giving them some medicine, surgical instruments, and a few bushels of wheat and corn.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I would ask the Senator if he does not think our consciences need some salve?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I believe in the right salve, and that is the recognition of the right of the Russian people to self-government. I believe in recognizing the actual facts, and the actual facts are that Russia has a stable government, functioning through all of its organs, just as ours does, the difference being that we belong to the family of nations and we will not let Russia into the family.

I was not aware of the fact that the Senator from New York intended to call up this bill. I have made no preparation to speak upon it, but it strikes me as not the right way to relieve the Russian situation, and I say that with all due respect to the Senator from New York. I do not think he is correct when he says that our own hospitals, governmental and otherwise, could not absorb all of the surplus medical supplies. I am not willing to vest in the Secretary of War an arbitrary discretion to say whether or not this country needs those medicines and those surgical supplies. We are setting a bad precedent. We are embarking upon legislation which will lead us far beyond this particular bill.

Charity, while it should not stay at home, should begin there. I know that throughout this whole country there are millions of people who need those medicines and who need those surgical supplies. I know that hospitals need them, and would be willing to buy them or to accept them for charitable use for charity patients.

The Senator speaks of a starving man being cured by medicine. No starving man, woman, or child needs medicine. Food is the medicine they need, and this bill would be idle, absolutely futile, if we did not follow it up by giving food in almost unlimited quantities. I could not vote for a thing like that when I know that there are millions of men, women, and children in my own country who have been reduced to starvation by some of the policies of our own Government, not by a blockade from the outside, not by any Admiral Kolchak, not by any Gen. Wrangel, not by any Polish invasion, but by the invasion of our own Government in ways which I have stated before and may again state. Nobody doubts that there are several millions of men out of employment. Nobody doubts that several million American women are in want. Nobody doubts that several million American children are facing starvation. How can we defend it, if we give our wheat, our corn, our canned goods, or any other article of food to foreign countries, leaving our own to starve?

Therefore, Mr. President, I hope the bill will not pass. I hope the Senator from New York will not press it. I hope that the supplies of the War Department will be devoted to our own people after the Secretary of War shall have made diligent inquiry to find out where they are needed, and in that inquiry he could be materially assisted by Senators, at least those from the South.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At this point the Chair desires to make a statement. It appears from the calendar that the unfinished business is Senate resolution 172, generally known as the Newberry case. In the opinion of the Chair the Newberry resolution is not at this time the unfinished business, and the Chair directs that the statement shall be omitted from the calendar to-morrow and thereafter. The Chair makes this statement because it would have seemed to be the duty of the Chair to lay that resolution before the Senate at 2 o'clock.

Mr. SMOOT. Am I to understand that the unfinished business was temporarily laid aside at 2 o'clock?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has just stated that there is no unfinished business and that the statement on the calendar to that effect is an error.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is a committee amendment now pending?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a committee amendment pending.

Mr. FRANCE. Are other amendments in order at this time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that an amendment to the committee amendment is in order.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, if the committee amendment is now pending I desire to address myself briefly to that amendment. I have in mind, however, to offer an amendment which will quite materially alter the bill. My amendment will provide for the striking out of all after the enacting clause and the substitution of a bill, namely, Senate bill 2717, offered by me on the 14th day of November, 1921, the provisions of which go very much further than the legislation which we now have before us.

I am entirely in favor of the legislation which has been reported by the committee, but I do not feel that it goes far enough. I feel that it would be far better at this time to authorize the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretaries of the other departments of the Government which have surplus supplies, to donate a larger quantity of supplies and a greater variety of supplies if the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretaries of the other departments having such supplies on hand should deem it wise to do so.

I find myself very much in sympathy with what the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] has said. I do not feel that the pending legislation is any proper remedy for the serious situation with reference to Russia into which we drifted under the last administration. I hope very shortly to see the policy of our Government changed. Certainly I hope to see it changed to the extent of our Government becoming willing at least to send a commission to Russia in order that this Government may be informed directly and disinterestedly as to what the conditions are in that great country.

I do not care at this time to go into any discussion of world politics. I am not prepared to do so for many reasons, but I do desire to say that practically all the information which we have had concerning conditions in the great country of Russia has been false information, and such false information has been sent over here with a very practical purpose by the gentlemen who inaugurated that false information.

Certain gentlemen in Europe who are wise statesmen, wise for the reason that they look after the interests of the populations of their various countries, know that the great Russian market is the greatest market in all the world to-day. They know that the natural resources of Russia are far greater than those of any other nation in the world to-day. They know that the potential wealth of Russia, the real wealth of Russia—because, after all, the only wealth is the real natural wealth of a country—is two and one-half times as great as that of the United States. They know that this vast wealth can be made the basis for credit in such a way that Russia can buy whatever she may require in any quantity. Knowing that, they are taking very great pains to see that the manufacturers of the United States and the farmers of the United States do not make contact with that great market before they themselves, for their own countries, make such contact.

Not only that, but there is going on in the world a great political game, concerning which I shall have something to say later. A great struggle is on in the world between two antagonistic systems and ideals of government, antagonistic and absolutely irreconcilable. Senators will remember what the great Lincoln said about a house divided against itself. That great statement is as true to-day with reference to world politics as it was true when uttered with reference to national polititcs. Either the world must come entirely under the domination of the imperial system or it must come under the domination of, if I may use the term, the American system. The imperialists of Europe know full well that if the two great anti-imperialistic Governments of the world—the United States and Russia—shall clasp hands in mutual understanding that would mark the doom forever of the imperial system in the world.

Senators, with our great wealth, with a great continent to develop, busy with the transformation of the natural resources of the United States into the visible wealth which we behold on every hand, the people and the statesmen of America have not busied themselves with learning the intricacies of the game of international politics, and we are now sitting at a table matching our wits with the past masters at that game.

Perhaps what I have said will give an intimation of my thought, but I shall say little more on the subject of the international question at the moment. I shall discuss it, I hope, in the near future at some length. What I have said will indicate that there were two very practical reasons why the United States and Russia should be kept apart.

The first reason is that the merchants of the European countries, the great pioneers of those European countries who have done much, I admit, for the development of the world, wanted Russia for themselves, as I can show later, and I have very definite information on that point. One of the countries of Europe could not have made certain agreements which it did make with Russia if Russia and the United States had been in contact and in cooperation.

I repeat that the first reason for our isolation from Russia is because those gentlemen in Europe wanted Russia for themselves as a market for their goods, and by the keeping of this Republic separate and apart from Russia they have preserved that great territory for themselves and those wonderful markets for their own goods. While we have surplus grain which our farmers can not sell, while we have several millions of men unemployed, Russia, the richest country in the world, with the greatest resources of any country, which any banker knows could be made a basis for credit, is in need of every kind of goods which we have or which we could supply. She could buy at once all the surplus cotton in the South and every bit of grain which is accumulating in the West; she could buy enough to start every spindle and every factory in the United States; she could keep all of our manufacturing enterprises busy for a year if they sold not another article of goods ordered by another customer.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I should like to know if the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from New York would be willing to include a million bales of cotton in the donation which they propose to make to Russia?

Mr. FRANCE. The Senator from Georgia is now proposing to offer the cotton with the salve. Personally I feel that the Russians do not need anything donated to them; that if they shall be put in a position to purchase they can purchase the cotton of the South.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I agree with the Senator about that.

Mr. FRANCE. Russia is so rich that she needs nothing given to her if she can receive fair treatment and opportunity to work out her destiny.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield to the Senator from Missouri with pleasure.

Mr. REED. For the sake of clarity, I want to ask the Senator from Maryland what he means by the statement that Russia is able to purchase the vast quantities of goods and materials to which he has referred? Does he mean that Russia has now presently the money with which to make these purchases, or does he mean that some kind of scheme of financing, based upon the real estate values of Russia, must be first adopted? I am asking purely for information.

If there is gold in Russia, if the Russians are ready to trade, then to put up a bar against them coming here and paying for things for which they are ready to pay and able to pay, and at the same time sending them goods as charity to prevent people from starving, who would not be starving if they have the money with which to buy and if they are permitted to buy, is, of course, wholly foolish. However, if Russia has no money and can not buy, but merely has resources which the Senator from Maryland thinks might at some time in the future be used as a basis for credit, that is a very different question, because before the latter operation could be carried into effect the people of Russia would be starved. I want, therefore, to ask the Senator to make plain what he means by the statement that Russia has the wealth and the ability to buy.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I can very readily answer the Senator's question. Before I went to Russia I was continually contending that Russia was able to buy goods from the United States, and that if we did not enter the Russian market some other country would do so. My prediction has come true. Russia has supplies of gold and supplies of raw products and great resources of natural wealth upon which credits could be based.

The Senator from Missouri knows, I am sure, for he knows almost everything connected with the legislative matters here, that about a year ago the question of whether we might sell to Russia was very acutely raised. At that time I contended that Russia did have gold, which has since been proven; indeed, a very large supply of gold with which she has bought products from Germany, from Great Britain, and, in spite of all the obstacles placed in the way, also from the United States. Since a year ago Russia has been continually buying goods from those countries and also to a lesser degree from Italy, for which goods she has been paying with gold. Indeed, it is an astonishing fact, and one which should enlighten some of our citizens who really know little about European affairs, that after a bar against the minting of Russian gold was placed by our Treasury Department the routes through which Russian gold reached the United States were changed, and within the last year we have taken from Russia large quantities of gold through Paris, the French themselves acting as brokers in the transaction. I was asked when I was in Russia if I thought it was fair that we should maintain a policy which has resulted within a short period in the Russians paying to the French $15,000,000 as commissions upon the transactions between the two countries—10 per cent of $150,000,000 worth of business? In other words, during the last year the Russians have sent through French channels $150,000,000 into America to pay for American goods.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I am not surprised to hear the Senator say that Russian gold has been coming into New York, because that had been currently stated in the newspapers; but I should like to have his information as to whether or not the Russian Government proposed to pay in gold to our Government the very large loan made before the blockade and that our Government refused to accept.

Mr. FRANCE. If the Senator will permit me, I will finish answering the question of the Senator from Missouri, and then, if he will pardon me, I will ask him to repeat his question, for I do not think I quite understand it.

The Russians have had a large quantity of gold. I refer to the quantity of gold which they had on hand after the revolution. I will not go into the question as to the amount of gold which they had for the purchase of goods during the last year, but the amount was very considerable.

Russia also has raw products. Of course, I need not say in passing that no country for any considerable time can purchase with gold. As the President very wisely said this morning, trade must be reciprocal, and no country can continue to sell which does not buy. No country can continue to buy which does not sell, and it is not to be assumed that Russia could very long continue to purchase in the world's market with gold. However, she still has a supply of gold on hand.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in the interest of the truth of history, as we often say, the President did say that trade must be reciprocal; but he also stated that if the ships could go out full it was all right if they could come back reasonably empty. That was the meaning of what he said. I am wondering how the statements can be reconciled.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, Russia, I will say to the Senator from Missouri, also has raw products, particularly furs and hemp, with which she could buy.

Now, with reference to trade processes, the purchase of any considerable amount of supplies by Russia would have to be based upon her credit. Of course, that is the only method which would be efficient so far as Russia is concerned.

Mr. REED. Then, if I understand the Senator—and I am not asking these questions in a controversial spirit at all—the probabilities are that Russia does not possess gold in sufficient quantities so that she could come now into our market or into any other market without supplementing her gold by trade and buy sufficient supplies to meet the wants of her people.

Mr. FRANCE. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that she could not do so, because the wants of her people are so vast. I have estimated from a very careful study of conditions that Russia needs immediately at least $2,000,000,000 worth of goods, as a minimum amount, and Russia has not $2,000,000,000 in gold at the present time, nor has any country save our own a gold reserve approximating that amount.

Mr. REED. Let me ask a further question. It is true, is it not, that Russia's general currency has been depreciated so that it is of but slight value?

Mr. FRANCE. That is true, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. REED. Then, if Russia is to carry on the business of rehabilitating herself, or taking care of her people by procuring goods from the outside, she must trade. Now, what has Russia to trade to us or to other countries with which she can get supplies? I am now dealing not with the question of giving securities based upon her real estate, but the question of immediately available property that could be shipped.

Mr. FRANCE. Russia has for immediate shipment gold, certain raw products, particularly furs, hemp, and flax, and, perhaps more important than all, probably a very considerable supply of platinum. I have reason to believe that the stores of platinum which Russia had on hand at the beginning of the revolution have never been disposed of, so that Russia could immediately buy the food which she needs, and no doubt Russia to-day could meet the famine situation in Russia if she could be assured that before the next harvest it would be possible for her to finance herself.

Mr. REED. The Senator has been very generous of his time. Lest I should be misunderstood in asking these questions, I think the Senator will permit me to say that on several occasions I have spoken here upon the floor of the Senate in opposition to the embargo upon Russian trade. It has seemed to me, first, to be a usurpation of power and authority by the Treasury Department; that the excuse they offer—namely, that some of the Russian gold may have been wrongfully taken—is merely an excuse; that the real fact is that an economic boycott has been declared by the Treasury Department of the United States upon a great country with which we have always been at peace so far as any legal war was concerned, and with which we are at peace now. Moreover, I have said, and I say now, that in my humble judgment the policy—and I want to employ as mild a term as possible—is a very foolish policy.

We have traded always with all peoples everywhere who would trade with us. We have traded with the naked savages of the forest and not raised any question about their morals or their government. We traded with autocratic Russia and asked no questions as to how many poor wretches were being driven with the knout into Siberian mines to perish. We traded with Belgium when she was enacting the horrors which appalled the world in her African possessions. We have traded with the Hottentots, with the Patagonians, with the Chinese, with the Japanese, with the English and the French and every other nation and never asked a question, so far as trade was concerned with reference to their morals, their religion, or their government. For a little coterie in the Treasury Department, either of the past administration or of the present administration, to deny the right of trade to 100,000,000 American freemen is, in my opinion, not only unjustifiable but—well, Mr. President, I will not characterize it as I view it.

That is quite a different question from the recognition of the Russian Government. Will the Senator let me trench enough on his time to make a further remark? I think, from all I know of it, that the Russian Government is unsound from every standpoint; that it is based upon principles which can not endure; that it is abhorrent to our opinions regarding property and personal rights; but if I admit all that, it is my opinion that it is a juster government than the government of the imperialists of Russia who for centuries held a hundred million people in slavery attached to the soil and who at the end of hundreds of years of government left a condition where 90 per cent of the people could not read or write in any language, where the land is undeveloped by railroads or transportation, where ignorance and misery have walked about like twin evils. So, I say, bad as this government is, it can hardly be worse than the government of the Czar, and we traded with them and we recognized them.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for his contribution. In reply, I will say that it is true that, following the policies of the last administration, even this administration has placed certain bars in the way of trade with Russia, simply by carrying out the policies of the last administration, which is quite natural. It is a well-established principle of our Government that in dealing with foreign affairs sudden reversals should not be made, and it requires time to reverse a foreign policy of such importance as our Russian policy. Nevertheless, the bars have been raised against trade with Russia; and the placing of those bars against our trading with Russia has—and the American people are beginning to realize it—greatly redounded to the benefit of certain other nations.

I do not care to discuss now the character of the government in Russia, or the conditions which prevail there, as that would lead me too far afield; but certainly I can repeat what I said at the beginning of my remarks, that practically all of the information which we have received concerning Russia has been propaganda, inaugurated, as I was saying, for these two purposes: To separate us from the Russian markets, and—I will add the second one without enlarging upon it—to prevent the two great anti-imperialistic Republics—because the foreign policy of Russia has now been announced as being anti-imperialistic—from coming into friendly cooperation.

Let me say to you that when the United States, with its well-established foreign policy, and when Russia, with its clearly announced new foreign policy, which it would be well worth the while of Senators to consider carefully—fortunately, the papers dealing with that have all been gathered now in a single volume, which can be read in a few short hours—when these two Republics, with that clearly announced foreign policy of each, come together in cooperation, you will need no league of nations. These two mighty Republics, controlling so much of the raw products and the wealth of the world, will be able very greatly to influence the policies of the other nations, and without them there can be no great war; for without their products, their vast resources—resources of materials, wealth, and men—no world war could be fought.

Unless Russia materially changes her foreign policy and unless we materially change ours, bear it in mind, by becoming allied with empires in the carrying out of an imperial policy—unless the Russians change their foreign policy or we change ours, I believe that a proper cooperation between these Republics would end war and in the end sound the death knell of that imperialism which is the cause of all war.

I yield now to the Senator from Georgia for a question.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, my question was, What is the understanding of the Senator from Maryland as to whether or not Russia, before those shipments of gold to France and New York, offered to pay our Government the $192,000,000 which former Russian Governments had borrowed from ours, and does the Senator know whether or not that offer was refused?

Mr. FRANCE. Personally, I do not know whether that is the case. It is a very interesting suggestion, however; and such a very rational procedure would be quite in harmony with our whole foreign policy as regards Russia.

Let me say one word, however, with reference to this administration and its foreign policy.

I confidently expect that our foreign policy with reference to Russia will be shortly changed. We have seen for some time the direction in which we were traveling. Those who have traveled on the seas know that all the great catastrophes at sea have occurred when the captain and the crew were looking disaster in the face.

They have occurred when the great ship has been put on the wrong course by an unintelligent or uninformed pilot. They have occurred when all were aware that death and disaster were imminent, but when it was too late to change the course. It takes time to change the course of this Government with reference to its foreign affairs, but I believe that it will be changed. I feel confident that our Russian policy will be altered.

Just one word with reference to the importance of the Russian markets upon our situation here.

We do not know generally the cause of our unemployment here, but it is very evident. If on the average we had 4,000,000 men out of work during the first nine months of 1921, and if on the average each one of those men would have earned $70 a month, the wage bill for those men would amount to $280,000,000 a month, and in nine months the wage bill for those men would amount to about $2,500,000,000, in round numbers. Now, $2,500,000,000 is approximately the loss of our foreign trade this year as compared with our foreign trade last year. In other words, those 4,000,000 men are out of work because our foreign trade has fallen off $2,500,000,000; and the way to cure unemployment is to open up the foreign markets of the world, and they are great enough for all.

All of the mills of England, all of the factories of the United States, all of the industrial concerns of Germany, could not supply in five years the needs of Russia or what Russia will be amply able to buy when she shall be placed in a position to purchase.

However, that takes me rather aside from the particular legislation which is pending. I find myself in agreement with much which the Senator from Georgia has said. I know that we need a major operation; nevertheless, I will not refuse the poor patient a grain of anodyne. I know that it will take time to reverse our foreign policy, but in the meantime I know that there is agony and suffering, starvation and death, confronting millions of people in Russia.

To show you the reliability of the information which comes out of Russia, the Senator from New York has said that the Secretary of Commerce has stated that no clothing, no shoes, nothing is needed in Russia except medical supplies; and I know that the Secretary of Commerce gave that information in the utmost good faith.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I did not intend to quote the Secretary of Commerce in that manner, and I think I did not so quote him.

Mr. FRANCE. What did the Senator say?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That the unused clothing which the War Department has on hand is of such a character and so small in quantity that it is unimportant; that they do not need it. That was the Secretary's statement.

Mr. FRANCE. I ask the Senator's pardon if I misquoted him; I am seeking the figures, though I have not yet obtained them, but I am under the impression that the supplies of clothing under the control of the War Department are very large; that they have a vast supply of blankets, of shoes, of harness, of automobiles and trucks, of a vast number of articles almost inconceivable in their multiplicity and variety and in their quantity, which the Russians could use most advantageously. I do not care at this time to attempt to paint any picture of Russia, but do you know what an old Army uniform or a pair of second-hand shoes or an Army blanket would mean to a Russian? Let your imaginations run on for a little while. Picture a country of 150,000,000 which has been cut off from the markets of the world practically for four years, first by her friends and later by those whom she did befriend and save. The destitution there is almost inconceivable.

The bill which I propose, and which will shortly be read, is in no way in conflict with the bill reported by the committee. It simply enlarges the power of the Secretary, and enlarges the number of relief agencies through which these goods would be distributed. I have great confidence in the Secretary of War. Those who know what I have said about the Secretary of War on this floor know that I have confidence in and admiration for him, and I am not afraid to see his powers enlarged so that he may give to Russia whatever he may think will be of benefit to Russia.

My bill, however, is not merely a bill for charity to the Russians, but it is a bill which will bring benefit to Americans. Those of you who have not thought about this question very much can scarcely realize the demoralizing effect upon our markets of having these surplus Army supplies hanging over them—demoralizing in two ways, demoralizing because the price is apt to be suddenly broken in the particular place where these supplies are sold, demoralizing because there are constantly at work between those who wish to get these goods for disposal and the minor officials of the Government improper influences to induce those who have the goods for distribution to put the goods on the market under such conditions that they can not be readily bought by the ultimate consumer. I am not referring, of course, to the Secretary, not even to the Army officers, but to the minor officials. On the other hand, there are constantly at work influences of all kinds to prevent the selling of these goods on the markets.

Consider the question of automobiles and trucks. Do you wonder why they are out in the open weather and allowed to go to ruin? It is a very easy thing to understand. Personally, I do not know what to do about it. I know very well that if those trucks and automobiles are put on the market, it will result for a time in the closing of a large number of the truck and automobile factories, throwing thousands out of work. On the other hand, if they are allowed to lie in the open weather, they will be destroyed, so that they will be of no use. In other words, without going into the subject at any great length, I call attention to the fact that these vast supplies of Army stores are a menace to our markets. They are a contributing factor—a minor one, I must admit—to the unemployment from which we are suffering.

Not many months ago, during the last administration, a large delegation of canners of Maryland, representing both those who canned the goods and those who grew the goods, came to see the congressional delegation from the State of Maryland to see what could be done to prevent the demoralization of the canning industry of America by the threatened precipitation upon the market of the canned goods owned by the Army. The mere hanging over the market of those vast stores of canned goods so unsettled the confidence of the growers and the canners that they were unable to proceed with the making of their contracts.

The same thing is true of other goods. The hanging over the markets of the Government's surplus supply of blankets, of harnesses, of cotton duck tends to unsettle the confidence of those who are manufacturing those products. A short time ago I saw some advertisements of large sales of cotton duck in one of the Southern States, sales which would take place at ruinous prices, and sales which brought that cotton duck into competition both with the growers of cotton and the weavers of cotton. So these vast supplies tend to unsettle our markets, and we would return more quickly to normalcy if every single article of these surplus supplies not needed for the purposes of the Government were shipped immediately out of the country on Shipping Board ships. In that way we would clear our shelves.

I know that what I am saying is the truth. I know that my reasoning is absolutely sound, that this country would not be impoverished, but would be enriched; that our poor would not be impoverished, but they would be benefited, if all of these supplies were immediately removed from the country, vast supplies of goods upon which American labor has already performed the labor, and which, as long as they are here, whether they be given away or however they be disposed of in this country, will necessarily result in unemployment to the extent of the labor which has already been performed on those goods.

As far as the American workingman is concerned, the American workingman wants no charity. He only wants opportunity. I had not expected to discuss to-day the bill which I have introduced, but I may say that when it was presented to the Baltimore Federation of Labor, a body of most intelligent men, headed by a man of unusual genius and ability, Mr. Henry F. Broening, one of our best citizens in the State of Maryland, when this problem was presented to the members of the Baltimore Federation of Labor their first reaction was that these goods ought to be given to the poor here, and then, when they began to think about it and reason about it, they began to see that the giving of those goods to the poor here would simply increase poverty, as giving generally does increase poverty if it is unwise. They finally came out in a splendid indorsement of this bill as being a measure which would benefit our own country, and at the same time enable us to give a wonderful Christmas gift to the Russians.

I was moved when the President, a great and benevolent man, to-day advocated something for the relief of Russian sufferers. I know the conditions in Russia. I know that they need rolling stock very badly. I know that there could be loaded upon trucks at St. Petersburg or at Riga the grain which we will donate to the Russians, and those trucks could carry it almost immediately right into the famine districts. Much of the famine in Russia is due to the breakdown in transportation, a breakdown which could be relieved if we would send these automobiles and trucks there in the donation of our surplus supplies.

But let me tell you another thing about this measure which I am proposing. There would not be any loss to the manufacturers of the foreign market as the result of the giving of these supplies to Russia, and manufacturers are beginning to see that. After all, the large number of trucks which are lying out in the weather here in America is not a large amount for the vast country of Russia. They will be lost in that vast territory. They will simply constitute a free sample of American goods, given away, and the man who receives and uses a car or a truck of American manufacture will come back, of course, for the repairs to the car, will come back for a new truck like the old one, because there is no truck or automobile in the world that can compete with the truck or automobile of American manufacture. Not only that, but these trucks will teach them how to use tractors, and it will be highly beneficial to the Russians to have these automobiles and trucks, which they can use temporarily as tractors, as everyone knows, until they shall be ready to buy tractors for themselves.

I sincerely hope that the Senate will see the propriety of doing a little legislating on its own behalf. It would be a refreshing sight to see the Senate really take up a new piece of legislation, not recommended by a department, and pass it, and hand it to the department as a surprise Christmas present. It would mean a restoration of normalcy of a very startling kind and of the kind advocated by the President in his great message this morning.

I believe that any fair-minded Senator who will read the measure which I propose, and which I shall offer as an amendment, will see the advantage of such legislation over that which is reported by the committee, my legislation merely enlarging the quantity of goods, specifying additional goods, and enlarging the powers of the Secretary of War and all the officials who will handle the disposition of those goods through the various agencies, of which the American Relief will be one, and agencies like the Red Cross, the Near East Relief, the Young Men's Christian Association, the Salvation Army, and the Knights of Columbus will be others.

I ask the Senate at this time—although I had not expected to bring it up—to pass my bill. It has not been very many days since people began to call that "Senator FRANCE'S Christmas gift bill." It would be a Christmas gift to ourselves and a Christmas gift to Russia at the same time. I believe the legislation which I propose is far preferable to the legislation offered by the committee. I believe the Senate will ultimately pass the bill which I have proposed, because I am sure that the demand throughout the country for it is very great on the part of the workingmen, on the part of the cotton growers, on the part of the woolgrowers, on the part of the clothing manufacturers, harness manufacturers, automobile manufacturers—on the part of all, from the standpoint of self-interest and because it also appeals to a great humanitarian impulse.

Mr. President, being a physician, I have naturally studied somewhat the great mysteries of life and of nature. In my early days I believed certain of the strange medical superstitions, many of which have even survived down to the present time. One of those is that old age is caused by a hardening of the arteries. That is not true. I have discovered in more recent years, as a result of more careful study, under a wider experience, that old age is not caused by a hardening of the arteries, but that it is caused by a hardening of the heart. I am not referring to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON], who is a very young man of tender and generous heart and impulses.

There is a certain remedy against old age, and it is found in the Good Book, which is always true, and anyone who does not desire to grow old can take that remedy and it will insure him perpetual youth. That remedy is the little recipe, "Harden not your hearts."

I should like to see the splendid young Senator from Georgia—I know he has not a hard heart—and other Senators here support this Christmas gift bill, which I shall offer as an amendment, which is a more constructive piece of legislation, a more far-reaching piece of legislation, than the bill as reported by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee which the Secretary will report.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 1, lines 5 and 6, strike out the words "used clothing and footwear" and the comma.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment will be reported.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 1, lines 6 and 7, strike out the words "and foodstuffs."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment. I move to strike out all after the enacting clause and substitute therefor the following.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert before the enacting clause the following preamble:

Whereas the Departments of War, Navy, the Treasury, and the Shipping Board have on hand huge supplies of textiles, dry goods, and so forth, transportation and motor equipment and supplies, building supplies, metals, tools and supplies, medicines, drugs, hospital supplies, surgical instruments, foodstuffs, miscellaneous stores, technical equipment and supplies, chemicals, acids, paints, and oils, and the existence of such supplies constitutes a disturbing influence on agriculture, industry, and business, and as the sale of these supplies is now unfavorably affecting and will tend to further unsettle agricultural operations, industry, and business, and there is desperate need for such supplies in the countries where there is acute distress or famine, particularly in Russia, China, and in the Near East: Now, therefore,

And after the enacting clause insert the following:

That the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the chairman of the Shipping Board be, and they are hereby, authorized, either acting together or separately, to report to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget the amount of surplus supplies, other than arms, ammunition, and ships, not required by their several departments and which have been or may be declared available for sale or transfer, such as drugs, chemicals, surgical instruments, medical appliances, shoes, gloves, clothing, fabrics, cloths, blankets, harness, meats, canned vegetables, and other foods, automobiles, trucks, and other unused war supplies now held under the listings of textiles, dry goods, and equipage; transportation supplies, building supplies, metals, tools and supplies, medicines, drugs, hospital supplies, surgical instruments, foodstuffs, miscellaneous stores, technical equipment and supplies, chemicals, acids, paints, and oils.

SEC. 2. That the Director of the Bureau of the Budget be, and he is hereby, authorized, immediately upon the reception of such reports, to transfer to the several departments of the Government such supplies as they may be able to use, and that he be, and he is hereby, further authorized and directed to dispose of any remaining surplus of such supplies by gift, either directly to the sufferers in the countries where there is acute distress or famine, particularly in Russia, China, and the Near East, through agencies which he himself may create, or indirectly through the organizations attending to the work of mercy and morale in these countries, such as the Relief Committees of the Society of Friends, the Near East Relief, the Young Men's Christian Associations, the Red Cross, the Salvation Army, the Knights of Columbus, the Russian Relief Committee, the Russian Famine Fund, and the Jewish Distribution Committee, or such other organizations, engaged in the work of mercy and morale in these various countries, as may meet with the approval of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, and as may be acceptable to the Governments of the respective countries.

SEC. 3. That the Director of the Bureau of the Budget be, and he is hereby, authorized to request the cooperation of other departmental agencies, including the Shipping Board, to assist him in the handling, care, transportation, or shipment of such supplies.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. FRANCE. Before the vote is taken, I desire to offer an amendment to my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator desires to perfect his amendment, he has the right to do so.

Mr. FRANCE. I find that inadvertently a mistake has been made in the description of the American Relief Administration in Russia so that I ask to amend or perfect my amendment by the addition in line 6, page 3, before the word "relief," of the words "the American Relief Administration in Russia," so that it will read: "such as the American Relief Administration in Russia, the relief committees," and so forth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment of the Senator from Maryland will be modified as suggested, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

Mr. FRANCE. On this amendment I shall not ask for a yea-and-nay vote because I realize that the committee has not had an opportunity of really studying the amendment which I have offered, and that, therefore, some members of the committee might be inclined to vote against it at this time, whereas I think that later, when they have had an opportunity to examine the measure, they will perhaps be in favor of it. While I do not ask for a yea-and-nay vote at this time, I did not wish to seem to be giving my approval to the limited legislation presented by the committee when I had already proposed legislation of a much more far-reaching character. Although I hope my amendment will be agreed to, I shall not ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the vote is taken upon the amendment of the Senator from Maryland may I inquire of the chairman of the committee why there was no limitation placed in the bill as to the amount to be appropriated?

May I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that in August of this year I introduced a joint resolution which was referred to his committee, which provided:

That the President is hereby authorized to take from any surplus drugs, medicines, and medical supplies of his selection, and of the value of $5,000,000, from the medical stores of the War Department, and use and apply the same for the relief of sick and suffering people in Russia. The value of said supplies, to wit, the sum of $5,000,000 shall be credited to the War Department and charged against the appropriation of such supplies authorized by this act, and for this purpose this act shall be regarded as an act appropriating $5,000,000 for the purchase of such medical supplies.

It seems to me, if I may say so to my distinguished friend, that the measure which I offered and which is before his committee is better, more logical, and fairer to the War Department than the one which has been reported from the committee by its chairman. As we know, the War Department frequently has taken from it large supplies with which it has been charged in appropriation bills and for which it gets no credit. In the manner which I have proposed, the War Department would receive credit for the value of the medicines and other supplies that may be appropriated for the relief of Russia.

May I inquire of the Senator why my joint resolution was not acted upon, and why in the bill which has been reported from the committee there was no limitation as to amount?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the Senator's joint resolution differs very materially from the bill which the committee reported in that, according to his joint resolution, the President would be authorized to take medical supplies from the War Department, whether they were surplus or not. Whether they were needed by the Army or not, they are to be taken to the value of $5,000,000.

Mr. KING. They must be surplus.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is the Senator certain that he has that word in there?

Mr. KING. As proposed by me it reads:

That the President is hereby authorized to take from any surplus drugs—

And so forth.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was mistaken then. That was my error, and I desire to acknowledge it.

As to the appropriation which the Senator's resolution carries, the committee has considerable sympathy with that principle. The committee doubts, however, whether Congress would be willing to appropriate $5,000,000. It may be deemed an on-paper appropriation, but it is to be doubted if the Congress would be willing to appropriate the money from the Treasury to reimburse the department, Congress being very apt to believe the department would not need the money.

It was not deemed wise or necessary to put a limitation in the bill as to the amount of medical supplies which might be given to the American relief administration in Russia for distribution in that country, for the reason that the committee could not very well arrive at an accurate value or, for that matter, an accurate estimate of the amount or quantity of goods so valued. According to the information which comes to the committee, the amount is not large; it will not constitute a wastage of any considerable amount of property from the strictly business standpoint; and the committee thought it was entirely safe to leave that to the Secretary of War. That is the only explanation I can give the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, just a word. I regret that the chairman of the committee and the committee have reported in lieu of the joint resolution which I offered the bill which is now before us. The Senator from New York will perceive that one criticism which he leveled against my measure, if I may be pardoned for so saying, lacks merit. The intimation of the Senator was that the measure which I offered called for a direct appropriation, and the Senator expressed skepticism as to the willingness of Congress to make a direct appropriation of $5,000,000. I share that view of the Senator, if my resolution did operate to call for a direct appropriation of cash; but I ask the Senator's attention to the language of the resolution, which reads as follows:

That the President is hereby authorized to take from any surplus drugs, medicines, and medical supplies of his selection, and of the value of $5,000,000, from the medical stores of the War Department, and use and apply the same for the relief of sick and suffering people in Russia. The value of said supplies, to wit, the sum of $5,000,000, shall be credited to the War Department and charged against the appropriation of such supplies authorized by this act, and for this purpose this act shall be regarded as an act appropriating $5,000,000 for the purchase of such medical supplies.

In other words, the joint resolution merely embodied provisions for the purpose of protecting the War Department and making it appear, as it should be made to appear, that the War Department has not spent the large sum with which it is charged, but that it would receive a credit of $5,000,000. I think that when the War Department has surplus property and we take it away, as we have been taking it away from that department and turning it over to the Agricultural Department, the War Department ought to receive credit for the full value of such property, to the end that justice may be done to the War Department and that it may be made to appear to the American people and to the world that instead of the War Department spending, say, $100,000,000, it spent only $80,000,000, and that $20,000,000 of what it was charged with expending it had on hand in the shape of material which was sold to some other department of the Government, for which it received a credit, thus diminishing the amount, pro tanto, charged to the War Department. That is the purpose of my resolution, and it did seem to me that it was a fair thing to do in connection with the War Department in dealing with this matter.

The Senator from New York also made criticism as to the limitation contained in the joint resolution. The Senator expressed a doubt as to the ability of the War Department to ascertain the value of the supplies which would be turned over to Russia. Mr. President, it seems to me that there ought to be an appraisement, that there has been an appraisement, and that we ought to know just what we shall give to Russia. While we are more interested in the act of charity and philanthropy and altruism than in ascertaining just what we give to Russia, nevertheless we should know approximately the value of the commodities which we do give. The bill before us will never enlighten the public in that respect; it never will be stated what we did give.

In future years it may be said by those who are hostile to this country that we merely turned over to Russia in her dire distress some surplus supplies which were absolutely valueless and could not be used by ourselves; and in that way an attempt be made to detract from the dignity and the honor of the act which we are so voluntarily and cheerfully performing.

I do believe that the joint resolution which I have offered is far better than the bill which has been reported by the committee, though I have no pride of opinion in regard to it. If the joint resolution had been offered by the Senator from New York or by any other Senator, I should ask that it be substituted for the bill which has been reported by the committee, because the joint resolution has merits of which the bill before us is entirely devoid.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE].

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, December 7, 1921, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 6, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, the High and the Holy One, who inhabits eternity and to whom be glory and honor, count us worthy of our high calling and fulfill in us Thy good pleasure. When the ways are many, let Thy light shine upon the right one. O, let it glow with a flame of divine wisdom until we are moved by a compelling faith that lives when all things fail. We recall the past with all Thy mercies, but help us to grasp the present with all its responsibilities and anticipate the future with all its hopes. Gracious Lord, bestow upon our President a great measure of wisdom and look upon him with divine favor. Direct the Houses of Congress, and may all things be done in the fear of God and in the love of man. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RECESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House stand in recess subject to the call of the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the House stand in recess subject to the call of the Chair. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 9 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess.

DURING THE RECESS.

At 12 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m. the members of the President's Cabinet entered the Hall and took seats at the left of the Speaker's rostrum.

At 12 o'clock and 19 minutes p. m. the members of the Conference on the Limitation of Armament entered the Hall and took the seats reserved for them fronting the Speaker's rostrum.

AFTER RECESS.

At 12 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m. the House was called to order by the Speaker.

At 12 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m. the Doorkeeper announced the President pro tempore of the Senate of the United States and the Members of the United States Senate.

The Members of the House rose. The Senate, preceded by the President pro tempore [Mr. CUMMINS], and by their Secretary and Sergeant at Arms, entered the Chamber.

The President pro tempore took the chair at the right of the Speaker and the Members of the Senate took the seats reserved for them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as the committee on the part of the House to wait upon the President and conduct him to the Hall the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In behalf of the Senate, the Chair appoints the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

At 12 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m. the President, escorted by the committee of Senators and Representatives, entered the Hall of the House, was announced by the Doorkeeper, and stood at the Clerk's desk, amid applause on the floor and in the galleries.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House, the President of the United States. [Prolonged applause.]

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT.

MR. SPEAKER AND MEMBERS OF THE CONGRESS: It is a very gratifying privilege to come to the Congress with the Republic at peace with all the nations of the world. [Applause.] More, it is equally gratifying to report that our country is not only free from every impending menace of war, but there are growing assurances of the permanency of the peace which we so deeply cherish. [Applause.]

For approximately 10 years we have dwelt amid menaces of war or as participants in war's actualities, and the inevitable aftermath, with its disordered conditions, has added to the difficulties of government which adequately can not be appraised except by those who are in immediate contact and know the responsibilities. Our tasks would be less difficult if we had only ourselves to consider, but so much of the world was involved, the disordered conditions are so well-nigh universal, even among nations not engaged in actual warfare, that no permanent readjustments can be effected without consideration of our inescapable relationship to world affairs in finance and trade. [Applause.] Indeed, we should be unworthy of our best traditions if we were unmindful of social, moral, and political conditions which are not of direct concern to us but which do appeal to the human sympathies and the very becoming interest of a people blest with our national good fortune.

It is not my purpose to bring to you a program of world restoration. In the main, such a program must be worked out by the nations more directly concerned. They must themselves turn to the heroic remedies for the menacing conditions under which they are struggling; then we can help, and we mean to help. [Applause.] We shall do so unselfishly because there is compensation in the consciousness of assisting, selfishly because the commerce and international exchanges in trade, which marked our high tide of fortunate advancement, are possible only when the nations of all continents are restored to stable order and normal relationship.

In the main the contribution of this Republic to restored normalcy in the world must come through the initiative of the executive branch of the Government, but the best of intentions and most carefully considered purposes would fail utterly if the sanction and the cooperation of Congress were not cheerfully accorded.

I am very sure we shall have no conflict of opinion about constitutional duties or authority. During the anxieties of war, when necessity seemed compelling, there were excessive grants of authority and an extraordinary concentration of powers in the Chief Executive. The repeal of war-time legislation and the automatic expirations which attended the peace proclamations have put an end to these emergency excesses, but I have the wish to go further than that. I want to join you in restoring, in the most cordial way, the spirit of coordination and cooperation, and that mutuality of confidence and respect which is necessary in representative popular government.

Encroachment upon the functions of Congress or attempted dictation of its policy are not to be thought of, much less attempted, but there is an insistent call for harmony of purpose and concord of action to speed the solution of the difficult problems confronting both the legislative and executive branches of the Government.

It is worth while to make allusion here to the character of our Government, mindful as one must be that an address to you is no less a message to all our people, for whom you speak most intimately. Ours is a popular government through political parties. We divide along political lines, and I would ever have it so. I do not mean that partisan preferences should hinder any public servant in the performance of a conscientious and patriotic official duty. We saw partisan lines utterly obliterated when war imperiled, and our faith in the Republic was riveted anew. We ought not to find these partisan lines obstructing the expeditious solution of the urgent problems of peace.

Granting that we are fundamentally a representative popular government, with political parties the governing agencies, I believe the political party in power should assume responsibility, determine upon policies in the conference which supplements conventions and election campaigns, and then strive for achievement through adherence to the accepted policy. [Applause.]

There is vastly greater security, immensely more of the national viewpoint, much larger and prompter accomplishment where our divisions are along party lines, in the broader and loftier sense, than to divide geographically, or according to pursuits, or personal following. For a century and a third parties have been charged with responsibility and held to strict accounting. When they fail, they are relieved of authority; and the system has brought us to a national eminence no less than a world example.

Necessarily legislation is a matter of compromise. The full ideal is seldom attained. In that meeting of minds necessary to insure results there must and will be accommodations and compromises, but in the estimate of convictions and sincere purposes the supreme responsibility to national interest must not be ignored. The shield to the high-minded public servant who adheres to party policy is manifest, but the higher purpose is the good of the Republic as a whole.

It would be ungracious to withhold acknowledgment of the really large volume and excellent quality of work accomplished by the extraordinary session of Congress which so recently adjourned. I am not unmindful of the very difficult tasks with which you were called to deal, and no one can ignore the insistent conditions which, during recent years, have called for the continued and almost exclusive attention of your membership to public work. It would suggest insincerity if I expressed complete accord with every expression recorded in your roll calls, but we are all agreed about the difficulties and the inevitable divergence of opinion in seeking the reduction, amelioration, and readjustment of the burdens of taxation. Later on, when other problems are solved, I shall make some recommendations about renewed consideration of our tax program, but for the immediate time before us we must be content with the billion dollar reduction in the tax draft upon the people [applause], and diminished irritations, banished uncertainty, and improved methods of collection. By your sustainment of the rigid economies already inaugurated, with hoped-for extension of these economies and added efficiencies in administration, I believe further reductions may be enacted and hindering burdens abolished.

In these urgent economies we shall be immensely assisted by the budget system for which you made provision in the extraordinary session. The first budget is before you. Its preparation is a signal achievement, and the perfection of the system, a thing impossible in the few months available for its initial trial, will mark its enactment as the beginning of the greatest reformation in governmental practices since the beginning of the Republic. [Applause.]

There is pending a grant of authority to the administrative branch of the Government for the funding and settlement of our vast foreign loans growing out of our grant of war credits. With the hands of the executive branch held impotent to deal with these debts we are hindering urgent readjustments among our debtors and accomplishing nothing for ourselves. I think it is fair for the Congress to assume that the executive branch of the Government would adopt no major policy in dealing with these matters which would conflict with the purpose of Congress in authorizing the loans, certainly not without asking congressional approval, but there are minor problems incident to prudent loan transactions and the safeguarding of our interests which can not even be attempted without this authorization. It will be helpful to ourselves and it will improve conditions among our debtors if funding and the settlement of defaulted interest may be negotiated.

The previous Congress, deeply concerned in behalf of our merchant marine, in 1920 enacted the existing shipping law, designed for the upbuilding of the American merchant marine. Among other things provided to encourage our shipping on the world's seas, the Executive was directed to give notice of the termination of all existing commercial treaties in order to admit of reduced duties on imports carried in American bottoms. During the life of the act no Executive has complied with this order of the Congress. When the present administration came into responsibility it began an early inquiry into the failure to execute the expressed purpose of the Jones Act. Only one conclusion has been possible. Frankly, Members of House and Senate, eager as I am to join you in the making of an American merchant marine commensurate with our commerce, the denouncement of our commercial treaties would involve us in a chaos of trade relationships and add indescribably to the confusion of the already disordered commercial world. Our power to do so is not disputed, but power and ships, without comity of relationship, will not give us the expanded trade which is inseparably linked with a great merchant marine. [Applause.] Moreover, the applied reduction of duty, for which the treaty denouncements were necessary, encouraged only the carrying of dutiable imports to our shores, while the tonnage which unfurls the flag on the seas is both free and dutiable, and the cargoes which make a nation eminent in trade are outgoing, rather than incoming.

It is not my thought to lay the problem before you in detail to-day. It is desired only to say to you that the executive branch of the Government, uninfluenced by the protest of any nation, for none has been made, is well convinced that your proposal, highly intended and heartily supported here, is so fraught with difficulties and so marked by tendencies to discourage trade expansion, that I invite your tolerance of noncompliance for only a few weeks until a plan may be presented which contemplates no greater draft upon the Public Treasury, and which, though yet too crude to offer it to-day, gives such promise of expanding our merchant marine that it will argue its own approval. It is enough to say to-day that we are so possessed of ships, and the American intention to establish a merchant marine is so unalterable, that a plan of reimbursement, at no other cost than is contemplated in the existing act, will appeal to the pride and encourage the hope of all the American people.

There is before you the completion of the enactment of what has been termed a "permanent" tariff law, the word "permanent" being used to distinguish it from the emergency act which the Congress expedited early in the extraordinary session, and which is the law to-day. I can not too strongly urge an early completion of this necessary legislation. [Applause.] It is needed to stabilize our industry at home; it is essential to make more definite our trade relations abroad. More, it is vital to the preservation of many of our own industries which contribute so notably to the very lifeblood of our Nation.

There is now, and there always will be, a storm of conflicting opinion about any tariff revision. We can not go far wrong when we base our tariffs on the policy of preserving the productive activities which enhance employment and add to our national prosperity.

Again comes the reminder that we must not be unmindful of world conditions, that peoples are struggling for industrial rehabilitation and that we can not dwell in industrial and commercial exclusion and at the same time do the just thing in aiding world reconstruction and readjustment. We do not seek a selfish aloofness, and we could not profit by it were it possible. We recognize the necessity of buying wherever we sell, and the permanency of trade lies in its acceptable exchanges. In our pursuit of markets we must give as well as receive. We can not sell to others who do not produce, nor can we buy unless we produce at home. Sensible of every obligation of humanity, commerce, and finance, linked as they are in the present world condition, it is not to be argued that we need destroy ourselves to be helpful to others. With all my heart I wish restoration to the peoples blighted by the awful World War, but the process of restoration does not lie in our acceptance of like conditions. It were better to remain on firm ground, strive for ample employment and high standards of wage at home, and point the way to balanced budgets, rigid economies, and resolute, efficient work as the necessary remedies to cure disaster.

Everything relating to trade, among ourselves and among nations, has been expanded, excessive, inflated, abnormal, and there is a madness in finance which no American policy alone will cure. We are a creditor Nation, not by normal processes, but made so by war. It is not an unworthy selfishness to seek to save ourselves, when the processes of that salvation are not only not denied to others but commended to them. We seek to undermine for others no industry by which they subsist; we are obligated to permit the undermining of none of our own which make for employment and maintained activities.

Every contemplation, it little matters in which direction one turns, magnifies the difficulty of tariff legislation, but the necessity of the revision is magnified with it. Doubtless we are justified in seeking a more flexible policy than we have provided heretofore. I hope a way will be found to make for flexibility and elasticity, so that rates may be adjusted to meet unusual and changing conditions which can not be accurately anticipated. There are problems incident to unfair practices, and to exchanges which madness in money have made almost unsolvable. I know of no manner in which to effect this flexibility other than the extension of the powers of the Tariff Commission, so that it can adapt itself to a scientific and wholly just administration of the law.

I am not unmindful of the constitutional difficulties. These can be met by giving authority to the Chief Executive, who could proclaim additional duties to meet conditions which the Congress may designate.

At this point I must disavow any desire to enlarge the Executive's powers or add to the responsibilities of the office. They are already too large. If there were any other plan I would prefer it.

The grant of authority to proclaim would necessarily bring the Tariff Commission into new and enlarged activities, because no Executive could discharge such a duty except upon the information acquired and recommendations made by this commission. But the plan is feasible, and the proper functioning of the board would give us a better administration of a defined policy than ever can be made possible by tariff duties prescribed without flexibility.

There is a manifest difference of opinion about the merits of American valuation. Many nations have adopted delivery valuation as the basis for collecting duties; that is, they take the cost of the imports delivered at the port of entry as the basis for levying duty. It is no radical departure, in view of varying conditions and the disordered state of money values, to provide for American valuation, but there can not be ignored the danger of such a valuation, brought to the level of our own production costs, making our tariffs prohibitive. It might do so in many instances where imports ought to be encouraged. I believe Congress ought well consider the desirability of the only promising alternative, namely, a provision authorizing proclaimed American valuation, under prescribed conditions, on any given list of articles imported.

In this proposed flexibility, authorizing increases to meet conditions so likely to change, there should also be provision for decreases. A rate may be just to-day, and entirely out of proportion six months from to-day. If our tariffs are to be made equitable, and not necessarily burden our imports and hinder our trade abroad, frequent adjustment will be necessary for years to come. Knowing the impossibility of modification by act of Congress for any one or a score of lines without involving a long array of schedules, I think we shall go a long ways toward stabilization, if there is recognition of the Tariff Commission's fitness to recommend urgent changes by proclamation.

I am sure about public opinion favoring the early determination of our tariff policy. There have been reassuring signs of a business revival from the deep slump which all the world has been experiencing. Our unemployment, which gave us deep concern only a few weeks ago, has grown encouragingly less, and new assurances and renewed confidence will attend the congressional declaration that American industry will be held secure.

Much has been said about the protective policy for ourselves making it impossible for our debtors to discharge their obligations to us. This is a contention not now pressing for decision. If we must choose between a people in idleness pressing for the payment of indebtedness, or a people resuming the normal ways of employment and carrying the credit, let us choose the latter. [Applause.] Sometimes we appraise largest the human ill most vivid in our minds. We have been giving, and are giving now, of our influence and appeals to minimize the likelihood of war and throw off the crushing burdens of armament. It is all very earnest, with a national soul impelling. But a people unemployed, and gaunt with hunger, face a situation quite as disheartening as war, and our greater obligation to-day is to do the Government's part toward resuming productivity and promoting fortunate and remunerative employment.

Something more than tariff protection is required by American agriculture. To the farmer has come the earlier and the heavier burdens of readjustment. There is actual depression in our agricultural industry, while agricultural prosperity is absolutely essential to the general prosperity of the country.

Congress has sought very earnestly to provide relief. It has promptly given such temporary relief as has been possible, but the call is insistent for the permanent solution. It is inevitable that large crops lower the prices and short crops advance them. No legislation can cure that fundamental law. But there must be some economic solution for the excessive variation in returns for agricultural production.

It is rather shocking to be told, and to have the statement strongly supported, that 9,000,000 bales of cotton raised on American plantations in a given year will actually be worth more to the producers than 13,000,000 bales would have been. Equally shocking is the statement that 700,000,000 bushels of wheat, raised by American farmers, would bring them more money than a billion bushels. Yet these are not exaggerated statements. In a world where there are tens of millions who need food and clothing which they can not get, such a condition is sure to indict the social system which makes it possible.

In the main the remedy lies in distribution and marketing. Every proper encouragement should be given to the cooperative marketing programs. These have proven very helpful to the cooperating communities in Europe. In Russia the cooperative community has become the recognized bulwark of law and order, and saved individualism from engulfment in social paralysis. Ultimately they will be accredited with the salvation of the Russian State.

There is the appeal for this experiment. Why not try it? No one challenges the right of the farmer to a larger share of the consumer's pay for his product, no one disputes that we can not live without the farmer. He is justified in rebelling against the transportation cost. Given a fair return for his labor, he will have less occasion to appeal for financial aid; and given assurance that his labors shall not be in vain, we reassure all the people of a production sufficient to meet our national requirement and guard against disaster.

The base of the pyramid of civilization which rests upon the soil is shrinking through the drift of population from farm to city. For a generation we have been expressing more or less concern about this tendency. Economists have warned and statesmen have deplored. We thought for a time that modern conveniences and the more intimate contact would halt the movement, but it has gone steadily on. Perhaps only grim necessity will correct it, but we ought to find a less drastic remedy.

The existing scheme of adjusting freight rates has been favoring the basing points, until industries are attracted to some centers and repelled from others. A great volume of uneconomic and wasteful transportation has attended, and the cost increased accordingly. The grain-milling and meat-packing industries afford ample illustration, and the attending concentration is readily apparent. The menaces in concentration are not limited to the retarding influences on agriculture. Manifestly the conditions and terms of railway transportation ought not be permitted to increase this undesirable tendency. We have a just pride in our great cities, but we shall find a greater pride in the Nation, which has a larger distribution of its population into the country, where comparatively self-sufficient smaller communities may blend agricultural and manufacturing interests in harmonious helpfulness and enhanced good fortune. Such a movement contemplates no destruction of things wrought, of investments made, or wealth involved. It only looks to a general policy of transportation, of distributed industry, and of highway construction, to encourage the spread of our population and restore the proper balance between city and country. The problem may well have your earnest attention.

It has been perhaps the proudest claim of our American civilization that in dealing with human relationships it has constantly moved toward such justice in distributing the product of human energy that it has improved continuously the economic status of the mass of people. Ours has been a highly productive social organization. On the way up from the elemental stages of society we have eliminated slavery and serfdom and are now far on the way to the elimination of poverty.

Through the eradication of illiteracy and the diffusion of education mankind has reached a stage where we may fairly say that in the United States equality of opportunity has been attained, though all are not prepared to embrace it. There is, indeed, a too great divergence between the economic conditions of the most and the least favored classes in the community. But even that divergence has now come to the point where we bracket the very poor and the very rich together as the least fortunate classes. Our efforts may well be directed to improving the status of both.

While this set of problems is commonly comprehended under the general phrase "capital and labor," it is really vastly broader. It is a question of social and economic organization. Labor has become a large contributor, through its savings, to the stock of capital; while the people who own the largest individual aggregates of capital are themselves often hard and earnest laborers. Very often it is extremely difficult to draw the line of demarcation between the two groups; to determine whether a particular individual is entitled to be set down as laborer or as capitalist. In a very large proportion of cases he is both, and when he is both he is the most useful citizen.

The right of labor to organize is just as fundamental and necessary as is the right of capital to organize. The right of labor to negotiate, to deal with and solve its particular problems in an organized way, through its chosen agents, is just as essential as is the right of capital to organize, to maintain corporations, to limit the liabilities of stockholders. Indeed, we have come to recognize that the limited liability of the citizen as a member of a labor organization closely parallels the limitation of liability of the citizen as a stockholder in a corporation for profit. Along this line of reasoning we shall make the greatest progress toward solution of our problem of capital and labor.

In the case of the corporation which enjoys the privilege of limited liability of stockholders, particularly when engaged in the public service, it is recognized that the outside public has a large concern which must be protected; and so we provide regulations, restrictions, and in some cases detailed supervision. Likewise, in the case of labor organizations, we might well apply similar and equally well-defined principles of regulation and supervision in order to conserve the public's interests as affected by their operations. [Applause.]

Just as it is not desirable that a corporation shall be allowed to impose undue exactions upon the public, so it is not desirable that a labor organization shall be permitted to exact unfair terms of employment or subject the public to actual distresses in order to enforce its terms. [Applause.] Finally, just as we are earnestly seeking for procedures whereby to adjust and settle political differences between nations without resort to war, so we may well look about for means to settle the differences between organized capital and organized labor without resort to those forms of warfare which we recognize under the name of strikes, lockouts, boycotts, and the like.

As we have great bodies of law carefully regulating the organization and operations of industrial and financial corporations, as we have treaties and compacts among nations which look to the settlement of differences without the necessity of conflict in arms, so we might well have plans of conference, of common counsel, of mediation, arbitration, and judicial determination in controversies between labor and capital. To accomplish this would involve the necessity to develop a thoroughgoing code of practice in dealing with such affairs. It might be well to frankly set forth the superior interest of the community as a whole to either the labor group or the capital group. With rights, privileges, immunities, and modes of organization thus carefully defined, it should be possible to set up judicial or quasi judicial tribunals for the consideration and determination of all disputes which menace the public welfare.

In an industrial society such as ours the strike, the lockout, and the boycott are as much out of place and as disastrous in their results as is war or armed revolution in the domain of politics. The same disposition to reasonableness, to conciliation, to recognition of the other side's point of view, the same provision of fair and recognized tribunals and processes ought to make it possible to solve the one set of questions as easily as the other. I believe the solution is possible.

The consideration of such a policy would necessitate the exercise of care and deliberation in the construction of a code and a charter of elemental rights, dealing with the relations of employer and employee. This foundation in the law, dealing with the modern conditions of social and economic life, would hasten the building of the temple of peace in industry which a rejoicing nation would acclaim. [Applause.]

After each war, until the last, the Government has been enabled to give homes to its returned soldiers, and a large part of our settlement and development has attended this generous provision of land for the Nation's defenders.

There is yet unreserved approximately 200,000,000 acres in the public domain, 20,000,000 acres of which are known to be susceptible of reclamation and made fit for homes by provision for irrigation.

The Government has been assisting in the development of its remaining lands, until the estimated increase in land values in the irrigated sections is full $500,000,000, and the crops of 1920 alone on these lands are estimated to exceed $100,000,000. Under the law authorizing these expenditures for development the advances are to be returned, and it would be good business for the Government to provide for the reclamation of the remaining 20,000,000 acres, in addition to expediting the completion of projects long under way.

Under what is known as the coal and gas lease law, applicable also to deposits of phosphates and other minerals on the public domain, leases are now being made on the royalty basis and are producing large revenues to the Government. Under this legislation 10 per cent of all royalties is to be paid directly to the Federal Treasury, and of the remainder 50 per cent is to be used for reclamation of arid lands by irrigation and 40 per cent is to be paid to the States in which the operations are located, to be used by them for school and road purposes.

These resources are so vast and the development is affording so reliable a basis of estimates that the Interior Department expresses the belief that ultimately the present law will add in royalties and payments to the treasuries of the Federal Government and the States containing these public lands a total of $12,000,000,000. This means, of course, an added wealth of many times that sum. These prospects seem to afford every justification of Government advances in reclamation and irrigation.

Contemplating the inevitable and desirable increase of population, there is another phase of reclamation full worthy of consideration. There are 79,000,000 acres of swamp and cut-over lands which may be reclaimed and made as valuable as any farm land we possess. These acres are largely located in Southern States, and the greater proportion is owned by the States or by private citizens. Congress has a report of the survey of this field for reclamation, and the feasibility is established. I gladly commend Federal aid, by way of advances, where State and private participation is assured.

Home making is one of the greater benefits which government can bestow. Measures are pending embodying the sound policy to which we may well adhere. It is easily possible to make available permanent homes which will provide, in turn, for prosperous American families, without injurious competition with established activities or imposition on wealth already acquired.

While we are thinking of promoting the fortunes of our own people, I am sure there is room in the sympathetic thought of America for fellow human beings who are suffering and dying of starvation in Russia. A severe drought in the Valley of the Volga has plunged 15,000,000 people into grievous famine. Our voluntary agencies are exerting themselves to the utmost to save the lives of children in this area, but it is now evident that unless relief is afforded the loss of life will extend into many millions. America can not be deaf to such a call as that.

We do not recognize the government of Russia, nor tolerate the propaganda which emanates therefrom, but we do not forget the traditions of Russian friendship. We may put aside our consideration of all international politics and fundamental differences in government. The big thing is the call of the suffering and the dying. [Applause.] Unreservedly I recommend the appropriation necessary to supply the American Relief Administration with 10,000,000 bushels of corn and 1,000,000 bushels of seed grains, not alone to halt the wave of death through starvation, but to enable spring planting in areas where the seed grains have been exhausted temporarily to stem starvation. [Applause.]

The American Relief Administration is directed in Russia by former officers of our own armies, and has fully demonstrated its ability to transport and distribute relief through American hands without hindrance or loss. The time has come to add the Government's support to the wonderful relief already wrought out of the generosity of the American private purse.

I am not unaware that we have suffering and privation at home. When it exceeds the capacity for the relief within the States concerned, it will have Federal consideration. It seems to me we should be indifferent to our own heart promptings, and out of accord with the spirit which acclaims the Christmastide, if we do not give out of our national abundance to lighten this burden of woe upon a people blameless and helpless in famine's peril.

There are a full score of topics concerning which it would be becoming to address you, and on which I have to make report at a later time. I have alluded to the things requiring your earlier attention. However, I can not end this limited address without a suggested amendment to the organic law.

Many of us belong to that school of thought which is hesitant about altering the fundamental law. I think our tax problems, the tendency of wealth to seek nontaxable investment, and the menacing increase of public debt, Federal, State, and municipal—all justify a proposal to change the Constitution so as to end the issue of nontaxable bonds. [Applause.] No action can change the status of the many billions outstanding, but we can guard against future encouragement of capital's paralysis, while a halt in the growth of public indebtedness would be beneficial throughout our whole land.

Such a change in the Constitution must be very thoroughly considered before submission. There ought to be known what influence it will have on the inevitable refunding of our vast national debt, how it will operate on the necessary refunding of State and municipal debt, how the advantages of Nation over State and municipality, or the contrary, may be avoided. Clearly the States would not ratify to their own apparent disadvantage. I suggest the consideration because the drift of wealth into nontaxable securities is hindering the flow of large capital to our industries, manufacturing, agricultural, and carrying, until we are discouraging the very activities which make our wealth.

Agreeable to your expressed desire and in complete accord with the purposes of the executive branch of the Government, there is in Washington, as you happily know, an International Conference now most earnestly at work on plans for the limitation of armament, a naval holiday, and the just settlement of problems which might develop into causes of international disagreement.

It is easy to believe a world hope is centered on this Capital City. A most gratifying world accomplishment is not improbable. [Prolonged applause.]

At 1 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m. the President and the members of his Cabinet retired from the Hall of the House.

Thereupon the President pro tempore and the Members of the Senate returned to their Chamber.

The SPEAKER. The joint session of the two Houses is now adjourned.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE OF RAINEY VERSUS SHAW.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged report from the Committee on Elections No. 2.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts submits a privileged report, of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LUCE, from the Committee on Elections No. 2, submits the following report from the Committee on Elections No. 2, to which was referred the contested-election case of Henry T. Rainey v. Guy L. Shaw, from the twentieth congressional district of the State of Illinois.

The SPEAKER. Referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed.

REFERENCE OF THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a reference of the President's message to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the reference will be so made.

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE HOUSE ON THE STATE OF THE UNION.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. What matter is to be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

Mr. MONDELL. Several gentlemen have expressed a desire to address the committee on matters of interest and, as they believe, of importance, and the purpose is to give these gentlemen an opportunity to discuss a variety of public questions.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Do these discussions which are about to be inflicted concern measures which are pending and which are of such moment that they can not wait for consideration under the rules of the House?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, it is not for me to judge as to the importance of addresses which gentlemen may desire to make. I can not think of them as being "inflicted" on the House. I believe that all of them will be well worthy of the attention of the committee. Several gentlemen on both sides have asked the opportunity to address the committee, and this seems quite an appropriate and opportune time, before we take up for consideration on the morrow a bill in which the gentleman from Massachusetts is much interested.

Mr. WALSH. I do not know what bill the gentleman refers to that is to come up on Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. MONDELL. On the day after to-morrow, if it can not be brought up to-morrow. It will be brought up as soon as we can do it. Gentlemen will, I trust, be patient in the meantime.

Mr. WALSH. We have got to be patient, but this procedure is going to make me very impatient. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman from Wyoming made no request as to the control of the time. That is entirely agreeable to me.

Mr. MONDELL. I have made no request, Mr. Speaker, but I think it perhaps would be just as well if the gentleman from Tennessee will control the time on that side and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] will control the time on this side.

Mr. WALSH. There will not be any time assigned by the gentleman from Massachusetts. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. Then perhaps I had better control the time on this side. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I was about to say that it is entirely agreeable to this side of the House either way, but we would like to have an understanding of what it is to be.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Tennessee control the time on that side of the House and I on this side, and the time to be equally divided.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the time be equally divided, to be controlled half by himself and half by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, on that question of equal division it was understood yesterday, I think, that I was to have an hour if needed.

Mr. MONDELL. I think that is true, Mr. Speaker, so that perhaps it is just as well to leave the matter as I suggested, with the understanding that I shall yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection?

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "ayes" appeared to have it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 136, noes 53.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote, because there is no quorum present. No; I will withdraw that.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] will please take the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. HICKS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JEFFERS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for 30 minutes.

A TRIBUTE TO THE WOMEN OF THE A. E. F.

Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, since the cessation of the hostilities of the World War we have heard and read much of the magnificent work done overseas by our matchless American soldiers. We have heard of their willingness and of their cheerfulness under circumstances most trying. We do not grow tired of hearing of their innumerable deeds of heroism which were performed on land and at sea and in the blue azure above. It is a wonderful story to our ever-eager ears, and always we realize that in truth the half has never yet been told. We will never, never tire of this narrative of the gallant American youth who boldly took up arms and went forth into foreign countries ready to make battle, ready to engage at once in deadly conflict with a merciless enemy, firm in his determination to do or die for the standard which we love and for the safety of the homes and mothers and children of his own country.

It is well, Mr. Chairman and my colleagues, and it is as it should be, that we do have in our hearts the deep feeling of love and appreciation that will keep always fresh in our memory the recollection of all that which was done for us by these boys, the very flower of our American manhood, who were in the service for us. Officially and as private citizens we are happy to do homage to them.

But what, my friends, of their loving and loyal-hearted sisters who also felt and heeded the call to duty; who so bravely forsook the shelter and comforts of home and fireside; who cheerfully gave up the companionship of friends and loved ones; and who also placed themselves unreservedly upon the altar of service? What of them? They joined up, side by side with their warrior brothers, ready to share with them the fortunes or misfortunes of grim warfare.

So, therefore, while our hearts do glow with unrestrained pride for the patriotism and the valor of our boys, and while we shall ever sing their praises so well deserved, we must not fail to express our heartfelt appreciation of, nor must we withhold our sincere applause for, the brilliant and unimpeachable record made by our superb American girls who served in all the various capacities with and for our Army and Navy and Marine Corps all during our participation in the Great World War.

I am proud to-day, Mr. Chairman, that it is my high privilege, as well as my sincere pleasure, to have the honor of paying special tribute, in this distinguished company, to the real American Beauty—that incomparable Rose of No Man's Land—the American Red Cross nurse. [Applause.]

In the camps and cantonments in this country it was she who toiled through the terrible hours, day and night, in hospital wards that were filled and overflowing with the victims of the awful influenza epidemic. There she stood tireless, vigil, giving freely of her strength, without concern for herself, working far beyond the usual hours of duty, day in and day out, willingly sapping away her own energy and vitality and thereby placing herself in a position where she would become liable to the deadly ravages of the dread disease. On through those dark nights and weary days she labored, with never a thought save one—and that one thought was that she must bring her stricken brother back to his wonted health and strength so that he might yet be fit to go forth to battle. [Applause.]

And then when the American Army—the fresh, new, youthful army from the west—flung itself like a drab-colored cyclone across the billowy and dangerous Atlantic, these true-hearted Army girls were ready, and they, too, made the passage. What cared they for the lurking enemy submarine? What cared they for all the war-time dangers of the high seas? The American girl crossing the ocean at that time was not traveling abroad for her pleasure. She knew she was on a serious mission, and she had a clear conception of what that mission was. One thought was uppermost in her mind as she approached foreign shores where new and strange adventures awaited her, and that thought was that her warrior brother would have need of her over there, and she was going over to help him, to cheer him on, to bolster his morale, to be sister and mother to him, to nurse him in his illness, to attend him when he suffered from cruel wounds, and finally to send him, well and happy, back to home and loved ones here. [Applause.]

Did she fulfill her mission? Did she meet the test in every way and at all times? Ah, yes; my friends, a thousand times yes; she has a glorious record, and the undying gratitude of those whom she served so nobly and so well.

We know that in her heart the flame of patriotism burned as brightly and as unquenchably as it burned in the heart of the most intrepid doughboy soldier on the far-flung battle front. [Applause.]

Picture, my friends, as best you can, a cold, wet, dreary October night in a ward in an evacuation hospital near the front. The building but a mere cockleshell; a lightly-constructed, knockdown portable affair. Cracks in the plank floor, through which the chilling, searching wind whistled its dismal tune. The rattling windows all carefully shaded so that no ray of the all too feeble light within might find its way into the darkness outside and thereby reveal the location to the prowling hostile aircraft, whose droning could be heard somewhere in the black expanse above. Imagine the rows of cots, packed in as closely as possible, all filled with bad cases, boys terribly wounded, fresh from the lines, suffering the mental and physical tortures of the damned, writhing in their agony; some cursing their luck; and some praying in reverence; others crying out to their beloved comrades or calling for mother or sweetheart in their delirium; and now and again throughout the night some poor soul meeting his merciful God in death. Amid a scene like that, picture, my good friends, a heaven-sent angel of mercy.

A sweet, pure girl; consecrated to her task; constantly moving amongst these stricken men; placing her gentle hand upon a fevered brow; whispering words of comfort and consolation to a delirious, tossing youth; telling a sobbing lad of how proud his mother would be of him when she knew; and tenderly administering in countless ways to the wants and needs of these, her fallen brothers. You know her very soul must have been agonizing beyond expression; you know her heart must have been literally breaking; but her magnificent spirit held up, and she went through on her iron nerve and her sustaining faith—she was on a cruel rack, but she met the test. [Applause.]

And yet, Mr. Chairman, shameful though it seems, and shameful though it is, we have recently seen articles in the daily press and periodicals of our country containing accounts of slanderous utterances reflecting upon the American nurse overseas. My friends, such baseness is worthy of the fiend incarnate himself [applause], and the most charitable view that can possibly be taken is that anyone guilty of any statement in any way besmirching the record of the Army Nurse Corps overseas is simply ignorant of the caliber of women who served so loyally in that splendid organization. [Applause.] Any person guilty of such vague insinuations and loose allegations is not worthy of the name of man or gentleman. [Applause.]

In the written records of the American Expeditionary Forces we find many true and wonderful stories of the unwavering devotion to duty and of the heroism of our American girls over there.

In the account of the activities of Evacuation Hospital No. 22 we find the following:

All through the night we could hear the men marching to and from the trenches and the rumble of the ammunition and supply wagons and ambulances coming and going and the noise of the motor cycles carrying dispatches, and all in the very blackest night. Strange to say, we have fallen asleep many nights to the guns and have also awakened by the sound of the guns and the flashes from a barrage which lighted up the walls of our dormitory, as we could always uncover our windows after the light was out, when we were allowed to have any. All the windows and doors were camouflaged, and there were practically no lights in the wards, and it was very hard for the night nurses to try to get around.

From the account of Base Hospital No. 15:

Twelve hours' constant duty in the operating room is hard work at all times, but when it came to 16 or 20 hours we were pretty well fagged out and still we never heard any complaint. How could we with those brave boys all around us? If we went off duty, it only meant that much longer for them to wait, and every hour their wounds would become more infected.

And such bravery as those boys displayed! I remember one young boy with a fractured skull. He was too badly shocked for ether, so the operation was performed under local anæsthetic. For huge skull wounds drills and all sorts of other instruments were used. One large piece of shrapnel was extracted by a very powerful magnet, and never a whimper from the boy. When we praised his pluck, he told us that anyone who could stand the life in the trenches as it had been for the past week could stand anything.

Another youngster about 18 years old had gone to sleep on a table waiting for his turn to come. Suddenly his voice rang through the operating room, "Why, hello there, it is an age since I have seen a woman like you!" The surgeon wanted to know if he was a friend of mine, poor little chap. He was pitiful enough for anyone to claim him as a friend.

Extract from the account of Evacuation Hospital No. 49:

Another case was a lad of 21. He was a true soldier in every sense of the word. He suffered everything, yet he never complained once. He came in with a badly infected right leg, which he was obliged to lose nearly to the hip. It was only his fighting spirit to get well that enabled us to keep him as long as we did. When he died, I wrote his mother telling her what a brave lad he had been, etc. Several weeks after I heard from her—and she was so grateful—I felt sorry I hadn't written to more mothers. But we had so little time.

We nurses lived quite comfortably, though we slept in damp tents, wallowed in mud, and ate things we never ate before or intended to eat again. As for cooties, we still have the scars! We were often in great danger, but very few, if any, had any thought of fear for herself. It was quite evident that each nurse was bound to do her bit in the effort to get her American brother well and safely home.

From the account of Base Hospital No. 15:

Our last camp at Fromereville will never be forgotten by any member of our little hospital. It was hardship, sacrifice, and toil from the day we came there. Something seemed to tell us that this was the last fight, and that it was going to be to the bitter end.

The tents were pitched on the top of a hill overlooking the ruins of the village. Verdun was only about 4 kilometers from us. At this time the Germans were shelling Verdun very heavily, but we never dreamed for a minute that they were after our little camp, when one morning (November 3) they got our range and threw over 13 shells. Headquarters was shelled down completely; some shells struck the tents and the shrapnel flew in every direction. The details can not be explained; it all happened so quickly. The concussion of the air when these huge shells burst was terrible. No one knew where the next one would fall, but I am glad to say there was not one coward among our nurses. All who were able to do so helped the boys. Some carried stretchers, others went about with bandages and dressings, and still others did their best to cover the boys up. As usual, it was raining, and it was cold. We lost 2 of our best sergeants, and 1 officer and 12 boys were wounded; but after all we considered ourselves fortunate to have so few casualties.

The mud and cold will always be associated with our stay at Fromereville. Our uniforms had at this time been considerably changed. Instead of uniforms with such trimmings as white collars and caps, we were then wearing high rubber boots, trench coats, and rain hats, not to speak of sweaters and underwear. They were on in several layers. The mud was so deep we could hardly get about, and the work was piling in on us. It was difficult for us to realize that the end was so near. We will never forget November 11, when the news reached us that the armistice had been signed. To think that once again we were to have peace!

Even though our wounded continued to come in for 12 hours after the armistice was signed, the change was felt everywhere. In the profound stillness after the barrage ceased we all had our own little way in which we made our joy known. Now that it is all over and we are back with civilization once again, we look back on the days of hardships, but, strangely enough, it is not the discomforts we think of, because they were small compared to the joy it was to have been permitted to be up with our boys at the time when they needed us most, and I do not believe but that if the time came again when we were needed everyone of us who went to the front would ask to go again.

There were many nurses, you understand, my friends, who were actually under the shell fire of the enemy, and some who were wounded in line of duty by the action of the enemy.

While in Evacuation Hospital 2, on the night of August 17, 1917, during a German air raid, Miss Beatrice Mary MacDonald was wounded and lost the sight of her right eye. Miss MacDonald upon recovering continued on duty until two months after the armistice was signed. She has been awarded the Royal Red Cross and the military medal by the British, and has also received the distinguished service cross from the United States Government. Miss MacDonald came with Base Hospital 2—Presbyterian, New York—and was on duty with the British forces at Etretat until transferred to Evacuation Hospital 2 May 4, 1918.

Miss Isabel Stambaugh, who came to France with Base Hospital 10 and was stationed at Le Treport with British General Hospital No. 16, was wounded in the left leg by a piece of shrapnel during an air raid March 23, 1918. She had been sent with a team to a British casualty clearing station not far from Amiens, but when it was bombed retreat was made to Amiens, where more raids occurred. Upon recovering she, too, continued her work, and remained with her unit until returned to the States April 2, 1919.

The third nurse, Miss Eva Jean Parmalee, came with Base Hospital 5—Peter Bent Brigham, Boston—was stationed at Dannes Cammiers at British General Hospital No. 11. At the time the first American men of the American forces were killed during an enemy air raid on the night of September 4, 1917, Miss Parmalee received a slight wound in the face. Her injury did not necessitate her relief from duty. She has been cited by Gen. Pershing for "exceptional conduct" and decorated by the British.

It may be of interest to show in the centers, where the largest number of patients were grouped at this time, how many nurses were on duty. At Mesves center, on November 16, the center's "peak" day, there were 20,186 patients in the 10 hospitals, cared for by 394 nurses—1 nurse to 51 patients. At Allerey, on the 17th, in their six hospitals there were 17,140 patients, cared for by 360 nurses—1 to 48. Mars, on the 16th, in six hospitals had 14,302 patients, cared for by 493 nurses—1 to 30. And at Toul, on the 28th of November, in seven hospitals there were 10,963 patients, cared for by 320 nurses—1 to 34. The maximum number of nurses at these centers at one time was: Mesves, 650 on January 4; Mars, 642 on December 4; Toul, 438 on February 1.

Now, this was long after the armistice, and it will readily be seen that the nurses still had plenty to do.

The following paragraph from the report of Col. Wadhams, chief, Group B, G–4, general staff, general headquarters, may be of interest at this point:

It is unfortunate but certain that the Army and people at large will never be able to realize the debt of gratitude which they owe to the splendid and self-sacrificing personnel of these units (bases). Owing to the chronic shortage of sanitary personnel for duty at advanced sanitary formations (evacuation and mobile hospitals), it was necessary in times of active operations to draw upon the base hospital. It was at just those periods that the burden carried by the base hospitals was heaviest and personnel could least well be spared. Surgeons and nurses literally dropped at the operating tables from fatigue, but complaints were almost never heard. It was a splendid manifestation of magnificent devotion to duty.

My colleagues, I want to state that from my own personal knowledge and observation I can say truthfully that the presence of the American girls helped the morals as well as the morale of many a man overseas. Their goodness and their purity had a certain refining influence on the men who had the privilege of coming in contact with them, and many an American mother is to-day thankful for the presence over there of some sweet American girl who perhaps caused her son to think of his mother or of his own sister back home.

So, Mr. Chairman, in closing let me repeat that we must never fail to sing the praises of the American Red Cross nurse. Truly, to her we owe a debt of gratitude. She deserves the unstinted commendation of the people of the whole Nation, and I believe, thank God, that she has it.

It occurred to me that it was particularly regrettable that the statements causing newspaper articles to which I referred a few moments ago came out just at a time when all our distinguished visitors from the other nations were here in our Capital City. I sincerely trust that they do not get the impression that any such loose insinuations were the sentiments of our people. I want these visitors who are within our gates to take back home with them the correct impression, and that is that all true Americans have for our own American women who were, and who are now, in our Army Nurse Corps the very highest esteem and utmost respect. Let us all emphatically tell the world that these noble women have, now and forevermore, the love and the everlasting gratitude of the people of the American Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Alabama use some of his time?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] in his absence asked me to take charge of the time on this side.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I wish to follow the gentleman for 15 minutes. I would like to be yielded 15 minutes, at the request of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. Is that satisfactory to the gentleman?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; to proceed now for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MANN). The gentleman from Washington is recognized for 15 minutes.

[Mr. JOHNSON of Washington addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Obviously, there is not. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HICKS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having under consideration the general state of the Union, and finding itself without a quorum, he had directed the roll to be called, that 259 Members had answered to their names—a quorum, and he handed in a list of the absentees for printing in the RECORD and in the Journal.

The committee resumed its sitting.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN].

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, that great American, our President, who about an hour ago addressed a joint session of the Congress, gave utterance to many splendid thoughts and sentiments with which we all agree. Not for the shadow of a moment can I believe that I was the only Member of this branch of the Congress who noticed that the American boy who won the World War and saved civilization received but scant attention in that message. I am sorry that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. FORDNEY] is not here and that he missed that message. I recall that in the summer months when we were considering the foreign debt refunding bill in this Chamber we were promised that the very first bill in the very first month of this session which the Ways and Means Committee would report would be a soldiers' bonus bill, and that it would have practically the solid support of the members of the Committee on Ways and Means. Now we read that the Republican leaders have decided not to pass a soldiers' bonus bill until next June, when this session will be closing and Members departing for home on other important business. If the soldiers' bonus bill is passed in June and a quarterly payment provided for the 4,000,000 men who fought for the flag, the first quarterly payment will come on the eve of the congressional elections. Then, again, we are told that a Republican Congress is not going to pass any soldiers' bonus bill, that the leaders are hoping to substitute for it an insurance-pension program, and that the insurance-pension program is very close to the President's heart. A Cabinet officer is now at work, we are told, and it is going to take him one year to bring out this insurance-pension program for our soldiers who saved civilization. Well, we do not know whether it is going to be a year or two years before we know the program; and we do not know, if they work out any insurance program, how long it will take to pass the legislation necessary to put the program on the statute books. This afternoon I am going to talk to a branch of Congress which has as much at stake as any other branch, as any other official who is clothed with power and authority to run our Government. I am going to talk to the branch of Congress which already has passed a soldiers' bonus bill.

In 1920, in the last Congress, this branch passed a bonus bill. To be sure there was some opposition on both sides of this Chamber, and I want my speech to be considered in no political sense whatever; I want to attempt to bring home to the minds of the Members of this House the duty which confronts them, and to some of them the dangers which may be awaiting them.

So far as the service men of our country are concerned, we have come to the parting of the ways; the feet of the Nation are at a spot where its onward march points in two directions, one of which we must take—the hard and stony road at whose end stands the temple of our national honor, and the smooth, broad road that leads to the house of broken pledges. At the entrance to one path stands the soldier who sacrificed; at the other the money broker who betrays. Which will you listen to, the voice of honor or the tongue of greed? You must make your choice to-day and decide which is the more precious national heritage for this land and its sons—an untarnished escutcheon or a fat Treasury?

The war is over. Our treaties of peace are signed. We are being told that we have saved civilization and liberty. Out there in the street the worn and wounded soldier of the war stands asking, "Will you now redeem your pledges and save your honor?" Whom will you serve, the patriot or the pawnbroker?

What will it profit the Nation to have gained the whole world if it has lost its soul? The pledge we made to the dead who died and to the living who have come back to face us here is more sacred than the promises printed on the bonds we gave our creditors, for while the bond is the pledge of the Nation's credit the other is the pledge of a Nation's honor.

Congress has listened to many voices since November 11, 1918; it has preferred the siren to the soldier. It has wasted the Nation's wealth on dubious schemes disguised as charity, health, education, and the egregious things called uplift and welfare. The horseleech's daughter has sat at the door of the Treasury. Congress has given millions to the railroads for imaginary losses; it has paid the usury of the alien carrier, forgetting his vast indebtedness to us; and the fantastic claims of contractors and patriotic profiteers have cost us billions and never a voice of protest raised. We are spending millions throughout the land for posthumous honors to the dead in ceremonials, in monuments, in arches, and in temples, and yet we have to be driven to bind up the wounds and satisfy the hunger of the living who call to us. We are exhibiting the historical ingratitude of Republics, forgetting in these days of peace and safety the promises made in the hours of panic and sacrifice, and repeating again the practices that called forth the reproach of the poet of the Revolution:

> When war is over and all things are righted,
> God is forgotten and the soldier slighted.

Look around, my friends, and witness, if you can, without blushing, the nations that were associated with us in the war and their treatment of the soldiers who served them in their hour of need. England and France remembered their promises; Australia and South Africa have not forgotten; our neighbor, Canada, has redeemed her pledges magnificently. No financial fears have kept them from the path of honor. They gave in pence as we gave in war—until it hurt—and the very voices that shrieked bankruptcy in our ears to keep us from the ways of honor and the fulfillment of our promises were the ones that gathered up our money to enable our associates to meet their pledges. They were willing to gather and give our money to the alien, and have denied it to our own soldier.

Again you see the greedy hand of the profiteer. There is profit in the foreign loan for the trader in dishonor; there will be no commission in the redeemed pledges of our Government. Better a thousand of our veterans should perish by the wayside than that one patriotic profiteer should go without his pound of flesh!

Lest we forget in these piping days of peace, let us go back in memory to those dreadful days of yesterday.

Whether they went as volunteer or conscript, our soldiers went with joy and enthusiasm to the service of the Republic; they sacrificed all they had—assured position and income, the promise of thriving business and lucrative profession; they went ungrudgingly beyond the seas at the call of duty to face dirt, danger, disease, and death; they put behind them home and all they loved and that make life worth living; they surrendered comfort and decency for filth and pestilence; and they faced the hazards and horrors of trench and trap uncomplainingly, indifferent to the pittance they were paid, sustained by their faith in their fellows and their confidence in the pledge of their Government that all would be well with them and their dependents in war and the peace beyond it.

At home in safety, far from the stealth of the submarine and the terror of the trench, remained the banker and the merchant, the contractor and the trader, the spouter and the chair warmer, the parasite and the profiteer, to cheer on the departing soldier, to swell the chorus of promises and pledges, to clutter up the streets of Washington and the pay rolls of the Nation and grow fat, insolent, and ungrateful on the grab and graft of greasy opportunity. [Applause.] In those days no promise was too glittering, no pledge too grandiloquent, to make to those who went out to do and dare and die. To-day none is too sacred to break and laugh at. The limping hero of the war has become the battered outcast of peace; and those who then dipped deepest in grab and greed shout loudest to-day of the "graft" of the hungry soldier. [Applause.]

The armies that went out from our shores in 1917 were composed of boys in the first flush of young manhood—exultant, exalted, idealistic, surrendering everything worth having and holding for the land and the flag, inspired by the faith that moves mountains, inflamed by the love of country and the passion for sacrifice that only youth with the promise of age and authority echoing in its ears can possess. And the pity of it! They have come back from all their sufferings and sacrifices, the youth in their hearts and the faith in their souls gone, disillusioned, cynical, their visions vanished, their whole being saturated with the sense of betrayal and abandonment. They have waked to find that Congress and the country have "welched" on them, and to learn that on Pennsylvania Avenue the little finger of finance is thicker than the body of valor, patriotism, and sacrifice. [Applause.]

You have scoffed at gratitude; you have scorned honor; you have made a jest of pledges and a gibe of promises. You have bowed low in reverence to your foreign debtors and laughed at your own veterans. You have listened to the tongues of Wall Street; you have hearkened to the paid clamor of Grub Street, and, sharing the tremors of the trader and the trimmer, you have refused to hear the plea of the soldier who fought and suffered and have caught only the virtuous protests of the stay-at-home and the service-chair hero. [Applause.]

The day of settlement is at hand. You will hear the voice of politics with increasing volume, and it is the voice of doom. The first blast was sounded in New York but a few weeks ago, and in the days fast coming you will find the ballots of the legion of the soldiers you slighted as deadly and disastrous as the German found their bullets and bayonets. [Applause.]

Congress has its choice now between an honorable bonus or political bankruptcy, and it must make its choice quickly. [Applause.]

The time to pay the so-called "bonus" is now. It is a debt of honor, a question of national good faith, and not an occasion for political tricks. If you defer action until next June in deference to your political hopes and fears you will be obeying the counsels of dishonor and infidelity.

The veteran of the Legion is intelligent, informed, insistent, and open eyed; he is not a gudgeon to be baited with stale tricks of politicians; his memory is longer than his ears; his ballot-laden hand is dangerous to honey-laden tongues [applause], and any slippery statesman who imagines he can fool a veteran with a June bonus will wake up a year from now to find he has caught a tartar with a November bludgeon in his fist.

The men who in 1917 sang "We won't come back till it's over over there" are now singing "You won't come back till you settle with us here." [Laughter and applause.] Now, this month, aye, this week is the appointed time. Get that June bug out of your head. [Laughter.] The Legion calls it a cootie. Stop talking about generosity. Keep that sort of "blather" for the benevolent banker, the British imperial debtor, the patriotic profiteer, and the Smith-Towner uplifters and tax eaters. [Laughter and applause.] What the soldier wants to hear while he is yet alive is the speech of duty and the spirit of justice. There are empty cupboards to-day. The flowers of June may be blooming over dead men's bones.

A wise philosopher once said of other veterans of other wars:

The vote that puts a square meal into the empty belly of a soldier while he is alive is a more practical form of gratitude than a law that plants a 10-ton monument on his stomach when he is dead.

[Laughter and applause.]

I am for a square meal at Christmas and not for a monument in June. [Applause.] The veteran asks for a bonus—for bread. I for one will not give him a stone. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts yields back eight minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNBAR].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, there is nothing that can stay the march of progress, and I am one of those who believe that the St. Lawrence River enterprise, if no other new force or energy of nature be discovered, will eventually be realized. It is impossible to tell what the future will bring forth and what will then be the necessity for the development of the St. Lawrence River. New powers from the sources of nature are daily being discovered and daily being applied.

I was very much interested yesterday morning in listening to the talk of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], when he told us of the dirigible that had arrived from Norfolk which had been inflated by helium, a noninflammable gas.

Helium, as an element and a gas, was unknown as existing on the earth until within the last 50 years, previous to which time it had been discovered as existing in the sun. All of its physical and chemical properties were known, but no one suspected that it would ever be a product of mother earth.

Radium is an element resembling helium, in that each are destined to revolutionize scientific thought and achievements. Radium is an element which is capable of emitting rays of energy which have in them the power sufficient, if additional amounts of radium can be discovered, to furnish the motive power of the world.

In chemistry and physics it has been proven that whenever any of the "rare elements" are found valuable, it does not matter how rare an element may be, it will come into common use if it is found to be commonly useful, and it is not rash to predict, that, within some scores of years, the emitting of rays of energy from radium will supply the motive power of the world. The total energy emitted from radium is one million times greater than that produced by the combination of oxygen and hydrogen in the form to produce water. The transmutation of radium and other rare metals have proven the dreams of the alchemist to be true. That the obtaining of gold from some of the other elements is a possibility; and it is not improbable that before a hundred years roll around gold may be obtained through the experience afforded by the conduct of radium, so as to make our gold bonds of less value than if they were payable in tin of equal coinage and weight. And so whether or not there be discovered some new source of energy in nature which will render the improvement of the St. Lawrence River unnecessary, I do not know, but unless there is I am among those who believe that the scheme of developing the St. Lawrence River before a great many years will have been consummated.

I can not, however, wholly agree with the gentleman's implied conclusion, who presented his figures on yesterday, in which he stated that if the St. Lawrence Canal scheme was completed there would be developed approximately 1,500,000 hydroelectric horsepower, and with this horsepower selling in Boston for the price of $70 per year per horsepower, it would bring in to the United States Treasury a revenue as a result of the enterprise of over $100,000,000 a year. He also made the statement that if the cost of the installation of the power house and the transmission would amount to $20 per horsepower per year, there would be approximately a profit of $70,000,000 a year. This may be true, but generating electrical stations and transmission lines could be constructed and operated under other conditions and circumstances which would bring to the Government a profit of $62,500,000 in the operation, if she wished to enter business enterprises, so that the real gain would be but $7,500,000.

I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that a hydroelectric generating plan on any waterfall has no advantage over an electric generating power plant which might be erected near the coal fields of our country excepting the cost of coal; and inasmuch as power plants could be erected at our coal fields, I believe that the shorter distance of transmission by reason of the nearness of the coal fields to the point of delivery of the electrical energy would make up even for the difference occasioned in the price paid for coal. Nut and slack coal can be purchased at our mines for $1 per ton. Coal for $1 per ton will develop in a modern efficient electric power plant 600 horsepower hours per ton. That is a cost of one-sixth of a cent per horsepower hour. Now, an electric power plant generating 1,500,000 horsepower for 10 hours per day, located at a coal field, would consume only $7,500,000 annually worth of fuel, so that it would be possible to install electric generating systems in our coal fields and afford power for a greater area of territory, which upon a return of $100,000,000 a year would cost only $7,500,000 more than the actual cost of the 1,500,000 hydroelectric horsepower generated by the falling water of the St. Lawrence River. So I do not believe that the generation of electricity by any installation which we might make on the St. Lawrence River would afford a sufficient return in the United States to be of any great advantage. However, I understand that it is advocated only as one of the by-products of the enterprise, and that the great purpose would be to afford an easy and sure passage of the products of our markets to European countries. As I said before there is great potentiality in this enterprise, and I believe that before many years roll around the St. Lawrence River project will be completed, and that the great advantages which were pictured by the two gentlemen who on yesterday so ably addressed you in this behalf will be realized.

But, gentlemen, while we are contemplating the advisability of the United States Government expending approximately $150,000,000 for this scheme, which at the best would enable us to find a market for our products by an outlet located in foreign territory, I am reminded of a saying by Emerson "that love afar is hate at home." I do not altogether agree with this statement, because I believe that our love for humanity and our spirit of enterprise and our desire to do good should extend beyond the confines of our own domain; but at the same time I am one of those who believe that in matters of enterprise we should begin at home.

In this connection I am reminded of the fact that in 1910 the Sixty-first Congress of the United States pledged itself to improve the Ohio River, the improvements to be completed in 12 years, so as to afford a 9-foot stage in that river throughout the year. Estimates were made for the improvement of the river, just as estimates have been made for the improvement of the St. Lawrence River. Those estimates provided for the construction of something like 53 locks and dams to cost approximately $60,000,000. There has been spent on these dams to date something like $40,000,000. The amount of money necessary to complete the dams and locks according to the original estimates is $20,000,000, but on account of the increased cost of labor and material it will probably cost $25,000,000 or $27,000,000 to complete the project. Thirty-one of the dams and locks have been completed. Twelve are in process of construction. Ten or eleven have not yet been commenced, but I am informed by Gen. Lansing H. Beach that some of the dams can be eliminated, so that it will not be necessary, in order to afford a 9-foot stage in the river, to begin more than seven or nine dams over and above those which have been completed and those which are already under construction.

Now, gentlemen, what is the situation in regard to the Ohio River? I live at New Albany, Ind., across the river from Louisville, Ky. When I was a boy, during the season of navigation hundreds upon hundreds of bales of cotton were landed at New Albany from ports on the Mississippi River every day when there was a stage of river sufficient to enable steamboats to run. That cotton was shipped to eastern seaports. And, gentlemen, steamboats would have continued to bring that cotton to northern ports; perhaps not only to New Albany but to Cincinnati, Louisville, Pittsburgh, St. Louis, and Evansville, according to advantageous railroad facilities afforded. I remember in my boyhood days when on the Ohio River the finest steamboat palaces were afloat, in which people would travel from northern cities to New Orleans and other places en route. I remember when tens of thousands of hogsheads of tobacco in a season were brought up the Ohio River and landed at New Albany and Louisville. Now, what is the situation to-day? None of that freight comes by water from southern ports. I remember when steamboats used to bring coal down the Ohio River from Pittsburgh and the Kanawha coal fields in West Virginia for one-fifth of the rate that was then charged by the railroads. Coal could be brought from Pittsburgh to New Albany and Louisville for 50 cents a ton. At the same time the rail rate was $2.30 a ton. I have seen the steamboat Joseph M. Sprague bring down the Ohio River 50 barges of coal, each one of which contained 1,000 tons. Those 50,000 tons of coal so brought down were the equivalent of 1,000 cars of coal, each containing 50 tons.

Gentlemen, you will ask why this river traffic has been discontinued. The reason is that the water in the river is not of a sufficient stage throughout the year to permit steamboats to come down the river with their cargoes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DUNBAR. May I have five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is in control of the time.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Wyoming has temporarily left the Chamber.

Mr. LAYTON. I ask that the gentleman from Indiana may have five minutes more.

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNBAR] is recognized for five minutes additional.

Mr. DUNBAR. Now, as I was saying, there is not a sufficient depth of water in all seasons to enable steamboats to operate on the river. Here was the condition that used to prevail: A steamboat would sometimes wait for months and months for a rise at Pittsburgh, and then it would proceed down the river on the rise, and wait for the river to be of a sufficient stage to return.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. DUNBAR. I will.

Mr. LAYTON. The gentleman says that in his day he remembers when the river afforded a depth of water sufficient for splendid passenger boats, but now it does not. Is that due to the filling up of the river or to the lessened watershed?

Mr. DUNBAR. It is supposed to be due to the fact that we have more floods now than formerly, and the reason that we have more floods is due to the fact that our forests have been depleted. The ground does not now retain the moisture which afforded a more constant supply of water to springs and rivulets that formerly fed the Ohio River.

As I was saying, the steamboat would wait for a rise in the river in order to return. Now, if you give a 9-foot stage of water in the Ohio River, there is not a day that there could not be half a dozen or a dozen steamboats come down the Ohio River towing barges containing coal which would amount to the equivalent of 6,000 and 12,000 cars of coal. Gentlemen, is there a man here who would not say that that in itself would relieve the railroad situation in the United States and would enable our people to receive coal at a price which in the calculation on transportation alone would save, even in our territory, $1.75 on a single ton of coal?

Formerly there were about 12 coal-boat rises in a year in the Pittsburgh district. Boats would be waiting, ready to take advantage of the "wave," and bring coal down the river. Then they would wait for another "wave," and return to Pittsburgh. This would keep a boat out of commission from five to nine months a year. Towboats would be filled with coal sometimes a month before they could be brought down the river. In those days manufactories and the people would lay in a supply of coal to last for four or five months, but after local coal began to become available people quit laying in a supply of coal to last them through the winter, and when coal could not be obtained from Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Kentucky, would purchase local coal. Now, I am sorry to say, they buy coal from "hand to mouth" and depend altogether on railroad transportation, when coal from aforementioned fields is not available by river transportation, which makes the investment in steamboat property and equipment unprofitable when they can only operate a few months in the year. A 9-foot stage in the Ohio River would enable steamboats conveying coal to be constantly engaged in its transportation, and coal could be brought down the Ohio River which would supply the territory contiguous in the Ohio and Mississippi Valleys at a greatly reduced price over the present cost.

Gentlemen, the Ohio River should be improved by the completion of the locks and dams under construction and the commencement and completion of those contemplated, and should be improved immediately. These facts as to the transportation of coal which I have cited to you will apply to everything that requires to be transported. The Ohio River is 800 miles in length from Pittsburgh to Cairo and in addition has 800 miles of tributaries. It traverses a territory almost as great as the frontage of the lake and the St. Lawrence River in the territory of the United States. While I am not opposed to the St. Lawrence project, I do believe we should first make our own rivers navigable and afford river transportation which could be made to carry the freight of 20 railroads of equal length, and that the money for the completion of the locks and dams on the Ohio River should immediately be appropriated and made available so that the river may be made navigable the year round, and in order that the $40,000,000 which we have already expended shall not longer continue to be an idle investment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has used 26 minutes and the gentleman from Tennessee 44 minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN].

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD my remarks on the agricultural situation, particularly in Southern States, and measures for the relief of the same.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on agriculture in the South. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, before I address myself to the subject which seems to be generally under discussion—the St. Lawrence Canal project—I want to call attention to this decentralization measure with reference to the Veterans' Bureau with its 14 division offices and 140 other offices. I have in my hand a record from my office of an incident that began late in August in which three checks going to a beneficiary in my county were stolen at the Atlanta suboffice. Notice was given by the director of the office in Washington to the Treasury of the United States of the loss of these checks on the 24th of September. From that time to this we have been referred first to one office and then to another. We have a communication from one office and then from another, but no two agree. I am not criticizing the offices, but merely calling attention to the fact that there can not be two places to handle one thing, and these things all shed themselves back to Washington. Now, what I hold in my hand is merely a part of the correspondence that I am going to have printed in order that Members may see the duplication that is occasioned by the new arrangement that we have.

On November 30 the office at Washington wrote us a letter in which they say they have not the numbers nor the dates nor the amount of the checks stolen, although that same officer gave notice to the Treasury that they had been stolen on September 24, and they said they could not go any further until that information was furnished. I transmitted that on December 1 to my constituent and told him he would have to go to work and get it. The next day we got a letter from the Atlanta office saying that the duplicate checks had been issued and the numbers were so and so; that they had been forwarded to our constituent, which was eminently satisfactory if he received it. Now, I want you to read this in the RECORD to-morrow to see what we may expect from the multiplication of authority and the duplication of work which Members of Congress are going to have in dealing with these matters.

I will say for the officials here and the officials in Atlanta that they have been diligent. I am not criticizing them, but you can not have things mixed up in two different offices and go on in a businesslike way.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that this record to which I have referred may be printed as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The record referred to is as follows:

SEPTEMBER 24, 1921.

TREASURER OF THE UNITED STATES,
Treasury Department.

SIR: Please enter stop-payment against the following checks drawn by R. S. Jackson, 92617:

Check No.	Amount.	Date.	Payee.

DIRECTOR'S OFFICE,
November 23, 1921.

Hon. W. F. STEVENSON,
House of Representatives, United States,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. STEVENSON: Replying to your letter of November 12, 1921, with reference to the three checks payable to the order of Smith D. Ellis, which were stolen, you are advised that the office of the Treasurer of the United States in a telephonic conversation stated the amount of these checks had been reclaimed, and in all probability settlement would be made shortly.

Yours, very truly, C. R. FORBES,
Director United States Veterans' Bureau.

DEAR SIR: Note the inclosed letter from the Director of the Veterans' Bureau. I will do what I can to expedite this matter as much as possible and will write you later in regard to it.

With best wishes and kindest regards,

Yours, very truly, ——— ———.

NOVEMBER 30, 1921.

Hon. W. F. STEVENSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. STEVENSON: In reply to your letter of November 22, 1921, with inclosure from Mr. Smith D. Ellis, Chesterfield, S. C., stating that he has failed to receive three checks under his compensation award, you are advised that as Mr. Ellis has failed to state which checks he has not received a complete statement of payments issued in his favor is given.

It is therefore requested that he make a review of this statement and immediately notify the bureau exactly which checks he has failed to receive in order that a further investigation may be made, and if such action is deemed advisable that an indemnity bond may be forwarded to Mr. Ellis.

Statement of payments.

Check No.	Period covered.	Amount.
44264909	Payment from June 19, 1918, to Nov. 30, 1920	$235.20
44481496	December, 1920, payment	8.00
44733238	Adjustment from Nov. 1, 1920, to Jan. 31, 1921	36.80
44935016	February, 1921, payment	8.00
45155008	March, 1921, payment	8.00
45372300	April, 1921, payment	8.00
40180802	Adjustment from Apr. 1, 1921, to May 31, 1921	152.00
40283889	Payment from Aug. 16, 1921, to Oct. 31, 1921	95.48

* * * * * * *

As this payee states that he is entitled to compensation in the amount of $80 a month instead of $40, a further investigation is being made of this claim, and Mr. Ellis will be advised at an early date as to the result of this investigation.

Very truly, yours,

C. R. FORBES,
Director United States Veterans' Bureau.

DECEMBER 2, 1921.

(Subject: Ellis, Smith D., Chesterfield, S. C.)

Hon. W. F. STEVENSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: With further reference to previous correspondence concerning the case of the above-named man, we are pleased to notify you that we are to-day forwarding to Mr. Ellis at Chesterfield, S. C., three substitute checks issued in lieu of checks previously made payable to Mr. Ellis which were stolen from the Atlanta local office, these substitute checks bearing same numbers and dates and for the same amounts for which reclamation of payment was made for the reason that the indorsements on the original checks were forged.

The checks which are forwarded to Mr. Ellis to-day are as follows:

Number.	Date.	Amount.
941013	July 31, 1921	$50.00
1523203	Aug. 2, 1921	30.00
2015238	Aug. 15, 1921	65.00

We thank you for your kind interest in this matter, and assure you of our readiness to cooperate with you in every way in serving the interests of the disabled men.

Respectfully,

M. BRYSON,
District Manager U. S. Veterans' Bureau.

DECEMBER 5, 1921.

Mr. SMITH D. ELLIS,
Chesterfield, S. C.

DEAR SIR: The inclosed letter from the Atlanta office, Veterans' Bureau, in regard to your checks, explains itself. You should have the checks by this time, and if you have received them, it won't be necessary to send the information called for in the director's letter of November 30, sent you by me on the 3d.

In regard to your compensation, I will write just as soon as I hear from the director. With best wishes and kindest regards.

Yours, very truly,

——— ———.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, this is supposed to be an era of Americanism, with America for Americans, an era in which we are to have an avoidance of entanglements elsewhere than in America, and for the construction of American industries. Yet we are asked by gentlemen who have shown their learning by their research to embark the United States in the construction of an international highway whose terminus, the neck of whose bottle, is entirely in the control of a foreign country—an international highway that is useful, too, for only eight months in the year, when we have the great Mississippi system, which you can connect up with the Great Lakes by a ship canal, which will be entirely within the jurisdiction of the United States, that will tremendously aid the cities of the United States and build up the commerce of the country and make a great waterway from the great city of Chicago straight down the valley of the richest country in the world to the ocean, all in American territory, where no foreign gun can ever fire a shot across it. That is the proposition which we are asked to abandon for the proposition to build a canal through foreign territory, owning it jointly with another nation, that nation having the control of the mouth of the river and being able on a minute's notice at any time it sees fit to shut down navigation of it by American craft and bring us thereby into all kinds of international conflicts. I am opposed to the proposition. The opposition to the proposition yesterday was very largely stated by the proponents of the measure to be on the part of the great city of New York because of its competition in a canal across New York State. I do not put my opposition to it on any selfish interest on the part of State or municipality.

In the first place, as I say, the Great Lakes are navigable for only eight months in the year. The season closes the 1st of December and it opens about the 1st of April. Your commerce out of the St. Lawrence River would be correspondingly shut up. Let us see what the international complications might be. Suppose we go into this in conjunction with the Dominion of Canada. We construct it, and we would become thereby half owners. Suppose we had a war with England. Oh, you say, war is a thing of the past. Well, I want a bond for that statement before we go into a transaction of that kind. We have not gotten to that state of affairs yet, that is certain. You say there is not any liability of our ever having any war with England. We may have, and we must attend to our affairs on the basis of that thing being possible, and possible at all times. Suppose we had a war, what would be the situation? They have control of the river for a great distance up from the ocean and can fortify it on either side and prevent an American ship from going upon it, while they can take their warships and merchant ships and put them into the Great Lakes and have them right at the door of the great commerce of Chicago and the other great centers on those Great Lakes and you could not help yourselves. Oh, you say, that is not likely to happen. It is what is possible that we have to avoid, and that is one of the possibilities. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CHALMERS] who represents the Toledo district would vote to make it possible for the English to at least put their submarines right at his door.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, let me say to the gentleman from South Carolina that the proponents of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence project are not opposed to water development in other sections of the country, but, on the other hand, are favorable to all projects that have merit. I would remind the gentleman that there is a treaty in existence between Great Britain and the United States which declares that the waters of the St. Lawrence River shall be free to the citizens of the United States. You say that Great Britain may break this treaty and warships and submarines come into our Great Lakes. My answer to that would be the Irishman's estimate of the value of a lock as protection on a leather bag. He said, "Shure a jackknife would laugh at that lock." So I would say to the gentleman a torpedo would in a moment destroy a dam or a lock, forming a permanent obstruction to the passage of a warship or a torpedo boat.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman concedes, however, that the mouth of the St. Lawrence River would be controlled by Canada and through Canada by England?

Mr. CHALMERS. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. In time of war treaties perish. I can not yield further now. That is the first thing you are up against. You are putting yourself in a position where you may have the improvements there for which you pay one-half used against you by a country that is inimical to your interests. You say that is not probable and my friend says that it is not possible. A great many things are possible which people did not believe to be possible a few years ago. Suppose we are on friendly terms always with England and Canada, but suppose England becomes embroiled in a war with France or Germany or any other great nation, and that England sees fit to use that canal for the transportation of contraband of war, to be used in war, or to use it for the purpose of a harbor for her fleet. Suppose she did and that France would say to the United States that we claimed to be a neutral and yet we were allowing England to use the canal of which we are the half owner for the purpose of moving contraband of war and making an assault upon her while we were at peace with her. What would be our answer to that? The only answer is that the United States would have to repudiate its interest in and control over the canal or have to say to England that she must get out of there, and immediately that would mean war, because she has a half interest in it; or we would have to say to the nation with which England is at war that we could not help ourselves, and that if that nation took exception to it we would have to fight about it. Where does that lead you? Talk about avoiding entangling alliances! It leads nowhere except to trouble. Not only that, but suppose the United States becomes embroiled with some other country in war, with this great inlet to the north of us, and that Canada and Great Britain are neutral and that we want to use that channel. Would we be allowed to do it? We would not be allowed to do it if England said no without a fight with England, and there you would lead again into conflict. Mr. Chairman, I am not talking ghost stories. If you will look at the history of the nations of the world you will see that it is out of just such things as that that wars of the world have arisen, and whenevor you embark upon that as an alternative to improving our own waterways, whenever you place our money and interest in an international waterway like that, which in time of war is sure to become a bone of contention, then, unless the United States and Canada become one and the same, a unit on every issue, you will have trouble, and whenever there is trouble between England and any other nation of the world the result is going to be that either you must allow the United States to be dragged in or you must let our flag trail in the dust and let England use at her own sweet will and in her own way and for unneutral purposes the property of which she is the half owner.

Well, now, what is the necessity for it? You can construct a ship canal across into the Mississippi River; you can with the same money that you would dig out that frozen river improve the Mississippi River and take the commerce of the world down it, and take it as cheap as you would take it down the St. Lawrence, and you will be building up America and American resources, and you will be bringing the markets of the world right to the door of the great granary and food-producing section of this country.

Now, I assert the view of it that I take. I do not want to see this country, because of the commercial greatness of the Middle West, and because of their ambition and desire to reach markets cheaply and to get cheap transportation, turn its back upon the greatest transportation system by water of any nation in the world potentially and embark upon a project which will be a retreat from our time-honored system of standing for America and Americans and keeping ourselves out of entanglements, and thereby lay ourselves liable in future generations to wake up to the most terrible national entanglements that we have ever conceived of. [Applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back five minutes.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, the speech made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] in behalf of the soldiers' bonus interested me greatly. On December 5, 1918, I introduced the first bill introduced in Congress providing for a bonus for our soldiers. On January 2, 1919, I made the first speech made in Congress in behalf of such legislation. That was the time when the bonus should have been granted. I believe that the bonus will yet be granted. I will stand with the gentleman from Massachusetts and other supporters of the bonus in all efforts looking toward that end.

But I did not rise to discuss the subject of a soldiers' bonus. I take the text for what I shall say from the address of the President, delivered an hour ago in this Chamber. The President, referring to labor organizations, said—I now quote from page 11 of his address as it has been issued:

> In the case of the corporation which enjoys the privilege of limited liability of stockholders, particularly when engaged in the public service, it is recognized that the outside public has a large concern which must be protected; and so we provide regulations, restrictions, and in some cases detailed supervision. Likewise in the case of labor organizations, we might well apply similar and equally well-defined principles of regulation and supervision in order to conserve the public's interests as affected by their operations.

Also:

> Just as it is not desirable that a corporation shall be allowed to impose undue exactions upon the public, so it is not desirable that a labor organization shall be permitted to exact unfair terms of employment or subject the public to actual distresses in order to enforce its terms.

Again, on page 12 he says:

> In an industrial society such as ours, the strike, the lockout, and the boycott are as much out of place and as disastrous in their results as is war or armed revolution in the domain of politics.

This is not the utterance of some loose-mouthed agitator. It is not the pronouncement of some hard-boiled president of an employers' association. It is a statement made by the President of the United States; a statement made with all deliberation, after consultation with his Cabinet, carefully thought out, and meaning every word it contains. It is a statement which expresses the labor policy of the administration which now, unhappily, is in power.

"YOU SHALL NOT QUIT YOUR JOB."

And what does the President mean? Analyze the language in which it is framed. It needs no emphasis from me. It is as clear as words can make it that the policy of the administration does not contemplate mediation nor mere arbitration courts such as the Railroad Labor Board, but has in view labor tribunals such as the Kansas industrial courts. It contemplates a system of industrial laws applied to the whole country similar to that now in force in Kansas. It means labor courts with authority to fix wages and terms of employment and with power to enforce their decrees. It means courts with power to stand over the men who toil and say to them, "You shall not quit your job. Your occupation is charged with a public interest, and you shall continue to labor for such wages as we shall decide are fair and just. You shall not strike before having your disputes decided by us." It means a policy on the part of this administration which will take away the right that workingmen in this country have had to decide their own affairs for themselves. It means that men will be thrown into jail who dare to strike without asking the permission of a court created by Congress and composed of the appointees of the present administration.

The President's statement is not mere jumble of loose and idle words. It expresses a policy deliberately chosen, carefully thought out, and which no doubt will be enforced with vigor. It has remained for the Chief Executive of this Nation to recommend a policy toward men who labor harsh beyond comparison with any government in the world. The choice will be presented to you, Members of the House, whether you will approve this policy or whether you will adhere to the old standards.

I was shocked and amazed by the President's statement of policy. As I listened I could but wonder. I wonder if the President remembers the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution? I wonder if he knows that slavery is forbidden in America? I wonder whether he realizes for what principle all the blood was shed during the Civil War? Is he trying to turn back the stream of time and bring again into this country the day of the manacle, when serfs will be made to work at the dictates of their masters? Are we to establish in this professedly democratic country an autocracy of employers of labor?

LABOR'S ORGANIZED FIGHTING FORCES.

What the President had to say was by its terms aimed at organized labor. I hold no brief for organized labor. I am interested more in organized than unorganized labor merely because organized labor is the fighting force of all labor. It is like the army that goes to the front and into the trenches to defend the women and children back at home. Never was a battle fought by organized labor that the humblest unorganized toiler did not receive some benefit from it. Never was a sacrifice made by labor organizations that was not made on behalf of unorganized men as much as for themselves. And for the same reason is it true that never was there a labor hater who wanted to grind down men who toil, who regarded them as belonging to an inferior social order, who wanted to oppress all laborers because they were laborers, who did not fight labor organizations fully conscious that when once he had destroyed the organizations unorganized labor would fall an easy victim.

When a Nation sends its soldiers to battle they are not sent against noncombatant and peaceful citizens at home in the enemy country. The first principle of military strategy is to "seek out and destroy the armed forces of the enemy." In the World War we sent our armies to do battle with the German armies, with the organized forces fighting for Germany. We did not concern ourselves so much with what happened in the homes of Germany, because we realized that once we destroyed the German armies the peaceable inhabitants at home would submit.

And so every employer who wants cheap labor, who wants to oppress labor, who wants to make an unjust profit out of labor—every man who believes in differences in social orders, every man who belongs to the employer class and recognizes his duty to his class and strength of the solidarity of his class takes off his coat and goes down to do battle with organized labor. And this instance of the President's attack by indirect methods upon the efficiency of labor organizations is, in my judgment, an apt illustration of this principle of strategy.

HITTING THE WORKER WHEN HE IS DOWN.

Of all times when a President might have addressed himself to measures intended to intimidate laboring men, this, it seems to me, is most inopportune. Oh, I have the ordinary American fighting instinct. We all love a good fight. We like to see a man fight, whether he be an employer or a worker. A real good fighter always commands our admiration. But every man who is himself brave loves a fair fight. We want to see the fighters on equal terms. We want to see both sides have an equal chance. We want to see the fight come at a time when both can stand on an equal footing.

As between workers and employers, fights can never be altogether fair fights. Each side in a labor fight has different things at stake. With an employer it is a matter, perhaps, of some more bank shares or a finer home, perhaps a marble palace instead of one of brick. It is merely a matter of another limousine or another cluster of jewels for his wife and another aigrette in her bonnet. It is merely a matter of profits from his plant. Oh, it is not such an awfully important matter with the employer. But with the man who toils bread is the stake.

The struggle between the employer and employee can never be a fair fight. One has in the scale only a question of profits. The other has the means of existence for his wife and children at stake. To one the result means one thing; to the other it means shelter and food and clothes and medicine for his family; it means the color in his child's cheek and, perhaps, whether it shall live or die. Anybody who thinks that a wage earner likes to strike is a fool. A strike always costs him more than it does the employer. Strikes are merely a form of warfare, and a strike, like other war, is hell, and its chiefest victims are the humble workers at the front.

Such a fight can never be a fair fight. Yet when conditions are even fairly equal, when there is a measure of prosperity in the country, when there is some opportunity for employment, when it may be said that there is a chance for the worker to win, then you may have a certain admiration for the hard-handed employer who goes down into a fight with his employee.

Oh, we all love a fair fight. But what about hitting a man when he is down? What about hitting the worker when his hands are tied? What about fighting a cripple or striking a man sick in bed? What about hitting the workers when they are walking the streets ragged and starving? And how about the workingman's wife and children, for whom he is responsible and who are dependent upon him?

Of all the times when the President's utterance might have been made, this is the most inopportune. Some 4,000,000 of men or more are out of employment. Many of them have been out of work for months. Many of them have exhausted their little savings. Many of them have tramped and tramped until their shoes are gone looking for work. Their clothes have passed from the state of respectability. The pinch of hunger is being felt in a million American homes. Millions of men, women, and children are destitute. They face direst need. Millions are dependent upon public charity. Only a few nights ago more than a hundred homeless men slept upon the cold, stone floors of the city hall in my home city.

Of all the times when men would strike, this is not the time. Of all the times when the restraints of law might be invoked to prevent strikes, this is not the time. Of those who have work millions are being sorely oppressed—millions are receiving a wage below any standard of decent living—they exist on hopes of better times. No doubt many strikes would occur except for the depressed conditions. The workers are submitting to oppression, even to slow starvation. They realize that they are being imposed upon. They submit because the choice is submission or quick starvation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes further to the gentleman from Alabama.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for 20 additional minutes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Many of the men who remain at work are not getting enough wages to live on. The United States Steel Corporation, which is the largest employer of labor in the country, has in many, if not in all, cases cut wages one-half. And that is the attitude of many harsh employers. The cost of living remains up. The workers are in a great strain, even those who have work.

THE RAILROAD LABOR SITUATION.

There is much that I would like to say about the situation of the railroad employees, but I have time merely to deal with it briefly. Against their unanimous opposition the labor sections of the transportation act were forced into that act. It was done at the behest of the railroad managers. And now we find that the managers are themselves flouting and evading the law and treating it with contempt. What is the result? They get away with little criticism. Due to the subserviency of a parasite press, knowledge of their misconduct is withheld from the public. The country does not know how flagrantly the railroad managers are violating the labor sections of the transportation act.

The country is flooded with false pro-railroad propaganda. In an effort to distract attention from the fact that the railroads are strangling the country through extortionate rates, a lot of deliberate lying is being done about the wages of railroad employees. The excuse is made that railroad wages are so excessively high that rates can not be reduced.

The present railroad rates were fixed after the increase in wages was granted in July, 1920, and were intended to cover by threefold all increases in wages. By the reduction in wages made in July, 1921, some $400,000,000 was lopped from railroad expenses. The railroads have made some minor rate reductions since that time to suit their own fancy, but there has been no general reduction, no reduction which anything near equals the cuts in wages.

The railroads also have had enough influence to get the Railroad Labor Board to make many changes in working rules and conditions, which have resulted in further reductions in wages, estimated at some $300,000,000. Still there is no reduction of rates except in a fanciful way as suited the whim of the carriers.

The relative wages of railroad employees have been grossly exaggerated. They are paid no such wages as the public has been led to believe. In certain classes, in which men have always worked for less than a living wage, increases have been given, but so far as the great bulk of railroad wages is concerned the employees are now working for lower wages, compared with what the money will buy in the way of necessaries of life, than they received in 1915. I can not take time to deal with this subject fully. I merely wish to cite for illustration the wages of certain classes of transportation employees. It is estimated by the Bureau of Labor Statistics that in May, 1921, the cost of living to the average wage earner was 73 per cent above 1915; that is, what $1 would buy in 1915 the consumer must pay $1.73 for. Figuring from this basis I find the results to be:

	Average annual compensation in 1915.	173 per cent of 1915 average.	Present compensation.	Percentages of decreases July 1, 1921.
Yard enginemen	$1,528	$2,643	$2,255	8.9
Yard firemen	916	1,585	1,684	11.3
Yard conductors	1,358	2,349	2,138	9.2
Yard brakemen	1,169	2,022	1,833	9.8
Road freight enginemen	1,846	3,194	2,625	8.3
Road freight firemen	1,136	1,965	1,837	10.8
Road freight conductors	1,589	2,749	2,353	10.0
Road freight brakemen	1,036	1,792	1,730	12.5
Passenger enginemen	2,141	3,704	3,042	7.4
Passenger firemen	1,287	2,227	2,223	9.6
Passenger conductors	1,850	3,201	2,771	8.6
Passenger brakemen	1,026	1,775	1,869	12.0

These figures show that in all cases of transportation employees, with the exception of yard firemen and passenger brakemen, they are really getting lower wages now than in 1915. This means, of course, that their scale of living has been lowered. It should be remembered also that the increases of July, 1920, came after four years of high prices during which railroad wages had remained upon the 1915 basis.

RAILROAD EMPLOYEES EXASPERATED.

Railroad employees are in a state of extreme exasperation. It was not altogether the proposed further reduction in wages that caused the recent threat of a railroad strike. It was the feeling upon the part of the employees that the carriers were not being fair with them, that they were not getting a square deal, that the laws for their protection were being evaded, flouted, and treated with contempt.

I want to cite a few instances which have contributed to the exasperation of railroad employees. The Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad has a terminal in my district. Its manager proposed about a year ago to ignore the transportation act and to make a horizontal cut in wages. The cut was posted on the boards. The employees thereupon appealed to the Railroad Labor Board, which promptly nullified the proposed cut and directed the manager to confer with the employees on the proposal to reduce wages. The manager refused to do this, but conspired with a creditor whose debt was not yet due and caused a collusive suit for receivership to be filed in a Federal court. The judge promptly appointed the manager as receiver, and upon his own request, without notice to the employees, authorized him to put in the same cut in wages which the Labor Board had ordered him to withdraw. The employees thereupon ceased work and entered upon a strike, which continues to this time. To their appeal the Labor Board answered that, since the Federal court had appointed a receiver, the Labor Board had lost jurisdiction. A similar case is that of the Missouri & North Arkansas Railroad.

I cite the case of the Erie, with its shops at Hornell and Marion, leased to dummy corporations organized by the railroad and officered by its former officials. The railroad made contracts with these dummies for repairs, and so forth, leaving them free to deal with their labor without the intervention of the Railroad Labor Board. The labor practices of these dummies have been outrageous and oppressive, yet there has been no relief for the employees.

Take the case of the Pennsylvania. Ordered by the Railroad Labor Board to negotiate with its shop employees through their organizations, the Pennsylvania created bastard organizations under its own domination and pretended that they were the employees' unions. The labor board struck down this fraud and again ordered the railroad to confer with the regular organizations of its employees as to its proposed reductions in wages. The railroad refused to do this and asked the labor board to reconsider its order; this was done, and the board adhered to its previous decisions and again ordered the railroad to confer with the organizations. Months have passed, and yet the railroad refuses to confer, yet the railroad refuses to obey the labor sections of the transportation act, which it was chiefly instrumental in forcing into that law.

These are but a few of many instances in which the railroads have behaved toward their employees as autocrats, as creatures above and beyond the law. Their posture is that they cause legislative bodies to make laws and that they are not required to obey the laws when made. The situation is enough to try the temper of the most patient employee. Small wonder that they are exasperated.

SHAKING FAITH IN AMERICAN INSTITUTIONS.

Oh, as I heard the President's speech I was amazed. I wondered what he was driving at. I imagine that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON], the sole Representative of the Socialist Party in the House, must have felt a certain kind of sardonic pleasure upon hearing what the President had to say. Of course, he was pained by the proposal. Of course, knowing the distressing conditions among the working people of this country, his sympathetic heart was troubled over what the President's program involves. But viewing it from a partisan slant he must have smiled.

That statement upon the part of the President means a million Socialist votes in the next election. There is no need for agitators to stand on the soap boxes. There is no function for antifree-speech laws. Such utterances as that of the President will do more to stir up political discontent in the people who work in this country than the mouthings of all the agitators who ever undertook to speak for radicalism. The President condemned the propaganda of the Russian soviet government. He spoke of it with contempt. Let me say to him that he has done more in those few sentences to destroy the faith of the people in American institutions than all that Lenin and Trotski could do in a hundred years.

Be it noted that the President proposes to deal merely with a symptom, to wit, the strike, and not with the cause for the strike. That does not appear to concern him. When the fight comes on between employer and worker, then he proposes to intervene. Armies are to be organized on each side. They are to arm themselves, and when they go down to battle then the President would intervene. His program does not contemplate amelioration. It does not contemplate any swing forward. He has learned nothing from the past. He proposes to hold on to the old system and to go the old way, with the old struggle between the employer and the man who works for him, each of them resorting to the extremes of individualism; then, when the worker at last aroused to desperation, unable to endure his condition any longer, rises up and undertakes to avail himself of the strength of his organization, this beneficent President would intervene and strike him down.

NO PARALLEL BETWEEN LABOR UNIONS AND CORPORATIONS.

The President refers to all corporations, and the uninformed might be misled into believing that all corporations are regulated and under Government control. Of course, nothing of the kind is true. Only a comparatively few corporations operating public utilities are under Federal control. We take, it is true, a certain concern with unfair trade practices; we have forbidden them, after a fashion. We have never asserted such measure of control of any corporation as the President undertakes to apply to the men who work.

And, further, there is an essential difference between the man who works and the corporation for which he works. There is no parallel between them. The corporation enjoys public privileges. It is an arm of the Government. It is created upon the theory that it is to perform a public function. It is clothed with certain powers which are inherent in government. It enjoys benefits, privileges, and immunities; the worker enjoys none. He is a plain citizen left to his own devices. No Government takes care of him. He has no advantages, no privileges, no benefits. And yet the President would apply to these humble men, many of them inexperienced and uneducated—he would apply to them the same harsh laws applicable to the meanest and most oppressive of the corporations.

I quite agree that public privileges and advantages carry responsibilities with them. And to turn that thought around, if the public recognizes no duty or responsibility to the individual, the individual owes no duty to the public. I ask that you ponder that. If we do not concern ourselves about the wage and condition of the worker, he is not under the slightest obligation to concern himself about our convenience and interest.

If his work is a matter of public concern, let the public meet its responsibility to the worker. Let it secure to him fair wages and permanence of employment. Let it secure to him proper living conditions. This, at least, the public must do in order for the worker to owe the public any duty to continue to work. How unfair it is, how unreasonable, that a man, merely because he works at a certain calling, owes the public some duty in connection with that calling although the public ignores its duty to protect him in following it. If the public gives him nothing why should be give the public anything?

To no activity of the citizen is the public a total stranger. The general public is concerned with all kinds of business and with everything that men do, with every activity of their business and their private lives. All have an effect upon the public; there is merely a difference in degree among them. And there are times when it is proper that the public respond and protect itself and its interests; but the public has no moral right to respond for its own protection unless it also responds to its responsibility and gives the individual the advantage and the protection to which he is entitled. The thing is not one-sided. It is a door that swings both ways.

WHY THE WORKERS OBJECT TO LABOR COURTS.

People ask why it is that labor is unwilling to leave it to courts to fix wages and conditions and other matters with which it is concerned? I will tell you frankly. It is because labor feels that in a controversy between the employer and the wage earner he can not get a square deal from the courts. That is why it is.

Men who work are not fools. They realize that men who compose Federal tribunals are nearly always appointed for political, social, and business reasons. The laboring men know that those who are so chosen must have attained prominence in the community, a certain prestige, that they must be men of influence and have influential friends. It necessarily follows that they are affiliated with and belong to the higher social classes, that their interests are the interests of the employers or that they are affiliated with the employer class, if not in interest then as a matter of sentiment; and that as a rule their social lines are tied to those of the employer class. Why, then, should labor be willing to trust its all to the discretion of such men? It is impossible that any such court should be wholly impartial. On the one side is all of wealth, prestige, influence, and social position; on the other the poor, the humble, the obscure, the inexperienced.

But let us proceed to another point. How can courts decide what is a fair wage for a man who works? Answer me that, some philosopher. What rules are they to follow, what precedents have they, what principles shall govern them? Who is wise and just enough to say that men should be discriminated among according to their occupations and that one occupation should give a larger return than another? Who can say that the producers who do the hard, dirty work should receive less than the professional and parasitic classes who follow the more pleasant occupations? Is it possible for a court to say Smith, a blacksmith, should receive $5 per day, and Jones, an engineer, $10 per day? What is there about any occupation that determines in advance what the return shall be to him who may follow it? It is impossible for a court, even if it were fair as Solomon, to hold the scales and justly determine what a man's wages should be, what the living conditions of his wife and children should be, what clothes they should wear, and what bread they should feed on. It can not be done, and any attempt to do it is the height of folly. No just legal system rules over men and elects one to wealth and ease and another to poverty and suffering. The question is whether you will adhere to the present system of giving labor a chance to fight its own battles in the strength of its organizations or hold labor back and let the employer work his will.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The President's message says, speaking about the settlement of these matters, that it would involve the necessity of developing a thoroughgoing code and practice in dealing with such affairs. Does the gentleman construe that as I do, as inviting legislation to put these things into effect?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Of course, it would be impossible to give it any other meaning.

Mr. LONDON. The gentleman described with a great deal of eloquence what passed through my mind when I listened to the President's message. It occurred to me that that was the beginning of the socialism of plutocracy as distinguished from the socialism of democracy. Socialism of plutocracy consists of a little group having control of the Government and the power to tell the great masses of people how they shall live, what they shall eat, and what they shall think.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I am obliged to the gentleman from New York. The program of the President carried to its logical conclusion would make of every laboring man or producer a slave to a society composed largely of idlers and parasites.

WILL ROCK NATION'S FOUNDATIONS.

Now, I must conclude. As I have said, I am not a member of any labor organization. I never followed any occupation which made me eligible to belong to one. But I am interested in labor organizations because they are the fighting forces for all men who toil. Without them in this era of acute industrialism the workers would be driven into practical serfdom. I am interested in the men who work because they compose the bulk of the common masses. I believe that the future of our country, and, indeed, of our civilization, lies in the welfare of the common man of this country, and therefore I want to see him put on higher ground and his life made brighter and happier so that his development and his march of progress may be sure. I am going to fight for that with every ounce of strength that in me lies.

I think I know something about the sentiments of the laboring men of America. I think I know what they are thinking about. I want to say to those who do not realize it that men who work for wages are exasperated to-day to a degree that they never knew before. There is discontent among them, but the discontent they feel is economic and industrial discontent. It is due to their sufferings, to the want of food, to low wages, and the oppression of their masters. That industrial and economic discontent may be converted into political discontent by the use of unjust political measures in dealing with it. By the use of such measures the Government will assume the burden which rightfully belongs to the employer and the exasperation which the worker feels will be discharged upon the Government.

The legislation which the President proposes will not be cheerfully accepted. It will not be easy to enforce. Men will resent it; they will resist it even as they are resisting the Kansas industrial act, where men go to jail rather than submit. As men have gone to jail in resenting injustice so will others go to jail. Instead of a program for industrial peace the President has proposed a program for industrial strife. He will cause strikes instead of preventing them. I warn the President and the big business interests back of him and the great employers for whom he was the spokesman here to-day that they have proposed a program which to carry out will rock the foundations of this Nation. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming has used 36 minutes and the gentleman from Tennessee 96 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, there was great difference of opinion in the Congress and in the country when President Wilson revived the practice abandoned early in the history of the Republic of appearing before the Congress and presenting his messages in person. There were many who did not approve that return to the old practice or the innovation, as they were pleased to term it. I approved it very heartily and expressed my approval at the time. I think it is a splendid thing for the President of the Republic to appear at a joint session and express his views to the Congress and to the country, as the President has to-day. President Wilson always delivered his messages in a pleasing and engaging way, and in that classic English and with the splendid diction that we all enjoyed.

President Harding has seen fit to follow what I believe was the wise policy of his predecessor in this regard. He presents to the eye a fine and pleasing picture, he looks the part, and he always brings a message of persuasion and conviction. If there is one quality that more than any other marks the message delivered by the Chief Executive to-day it is that of frankness and candor. Furthermore, there runs through the message to a marked degree a fine spirit of cordial copartnership and cooperation with the Congress. The President did not endeavor to cover the entire field of the problems before the country. He presented those he felt were the more pressing and the more important. He frankly told the Congress with regard to one particular act which the former Chief Executive did not feel justified in fully carrying out, that he hoped the Congress would be tolerant of noncompliance with the letter of that particular provision of the law for a brief period while plans were maturing for presentation to Congress for expanding our merchant marine which would argue their own approval.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. Is that the proposition upon which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] gave out a statement last fall saying that he intended to move to impeach President Wilson?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know anything about the matter to which the gentleman refers. I am not the keeper of all of the statements of all of the gentlemen who are Members of Congress, thank heaven! If I were I would feel a heavy load on my shoulders at this hour.

Mr. RAYBURN. And further, is not that the very act that Mr. Harding during the campaign from the front porch very much criticized the President of the United States for?

Mr. MONDELL. Not as far as I know; but, however that may be, there was and is this marked difference, that from the 4th of March to this good hour I know that the President has been endeavoring to find, and has consulted a goodly number of gentlemen, touching some practical modification of that statute under which we might operate to the advantage of the country without embroiling us with the nations of the world, while President Wilson, so far as I can recall, never made any effort or suggestion toward curing that situation. But that is only in passing. I have other matters of importance that I desire to discuss.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman from Wyoming state whether, in his opinion, President Harding followed the opinion of President Wilson, so far as these foreign treaties are concerned, because Mr. Wilson happened to be right or through affection for the former President?

Mr. MONDELL. It may have been both. I listened, and I am very sure all present listened, with very great interest and with very great satisfaction to what the President had to say to us in good nature, in good humor, with perfect candor, and breathing through it all that spirit of cooperation which is so essential in carrying forward the solution of the great problems before us.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Briefly.

Mr. BARKLEY. Would the gentleman aid me by stating, if he knows from the President's address, whether the President believes in the American-valuation plan in the Fordney tariff bill or not?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who has just interrogated me is one of the most intelligent men I know, and I am sure that it is entirely clear to him, as it is to me, that the President has some question in his mind as to the certain workability of that plan in its entirety at the present time or immediate future.

Mr. BARKLEY. I congratulate the gentleman from Wyoming upon his frankness, as well as the President.

Mr. MONDELL. And I want to say to my friend that the President is not the only man in the country who has some doubts as to whether so radical an innovation, which many people believe to be a very great improvement in our tariff policies, could be put into operation at once, safely and effectively. That is not to say, however, that the principle of American valuation is not sound and wise. The President left no such impression, and no such view may properly be taken from what the President said. There are many things that are sound and sane and sensible that can not safely or wisely be put into effect under all conditions. Nevertheless they are a desirable goal toward which we may well make our way. If after mature consideration it shall be deemed wise that the plan of the American valuation shall be somewhat modified, there would be nothing extraordinary about it, because many a man voted for the plan who was not altogether certain that it could be put into full and complete operation just at this time. However, that is a matter that can be discussed further at length, and it is not the matter that I arose to discuss to-day.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the suggestion of the President in respect to giving the Executive authority to fix customs duties, with the aid of the Tariff Commission, shall be adopted, then it really will not make very much difference about the American valuation plan, will it?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, yes; I think it will still be important as to whether customs duties are levied on foreign or domestic valuations. Now that the gentleman has referred to the President's suggestion relative to flexibility in customs duties, I want to say, although I did not intend to refer to it, that I am glad the President made that suggestion. You know one of the difficulties in this country with regard to the tariff is that unhappily it becomes a matter of partisan politics. All of us know that every man who sits on the Democratic side is not a free trader, and that every man who sits on the Republican side is not necessarily a high-tariff man. We on the Republican side believe in and proclaim the doctrine of protection. There are many gentlemen on the Democratic side who, while they might not care to admit it, I know are not at all averse to putting into operation and maintaining tariff rates that are not only incidentally but actually protective. Unfortunately, however, while that is true, when it comes to voting there is little or no reflection of the individual view, but rather a party vote apparently intended to accomplish that which will most discredit the other side.

Mr. Chairman, the side in the minority at the time of tariff revision—whichever side it happens to be—I think, of course, that the Democratic side is more blamable in that behalf than the Republican side, although both are blamable to a certain extent—instead of helping to perfect a tariff measure, bend their efforts toward discrediting it and making it as bad as possible. Some one complained because we did not give the opportunity for a thousand or more amendments on the tax bill. I am sorry that that can not be done. If it were done, the Democratic side would not offer amendments with the hope and purpose of perfecting the measure, but with a view and purpose of "putting the Republican side in the hole," if I may be permitted to use that colloquialism—of embarrassing the other side.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I believe that is what Mr. FORDNEY wanted to do with the President once upon a time.

Mr. MONDELL. I never heard of it.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MONDELL. Briefly.

Mr. RAYBURN. Under the rules under which we operate here we do not usually get an opportunity to help, but on those amendments that the Committee on Rules allowed the House to vote upon we did help in overturning the organization.

Mr. MONDELL. I can not agree that there was a disposition to help. If I were to agree that the outcome in any case he has in mind was a proper one, I would still insist—and know that I was right—that the votes on his side were not on the merits of the proposition, but on the theory that they did embarrass the majority. So even when you do right, if you ever do, you do not do it from a proper motive. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I assume the gentleman heartily agrees with that part of the President's message which said he believes these questions ought to be settled in conference; ought to be settled in the House?

Mr. MONDELL. I believe, as the gentleman does, in party responsibility. The gentleman from Texas and I are one on that proposition. When his side is in authority I think they ought to accept responsibility, when we are in control I think we ought to do so. The gentleman and I will not quarrel about that at all, and we will both agree with the President.

I have long hoped that we could eventually, and I believe we will eventually, get away from a purely partisan view of the tariff. We have made a little start along that line in the matter of the Tariff Board. We have a Tariff Board, that so far as the personal opinions of the majority of the board are concerned, I believe is now Democratic. It has been very valuable to us, because it has given us facts. That is what we want—facts. You may not agree with us as to what we should do on a given state of facts, but at least we shall have a basis for our difference of opinion or our agreement, as the case may be. I think the President has suggested one way whereby it may be possible, at least with regard to certain schedules of the tariff, to lay down a business policy that will keep our labor employed and industries prosperous, that will maintain American standards, while at the same time extending our trade with the world at large.

I think the President's suggestions are very valuable in this as they are in many things. In fact, I was so pleased with what the President said, with the whole tenor and spirit of it, that I have been amazed at the partisan harangue, if it may be parliamentary to use that term, which we just heard from the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON]. The President said not a word that any man could properly, honestly construe as in any wise expressing anything other than the view he holds and always has held of the dignity, high character, and sterling worth of American labor. No man in America as an employer has a finer record than he who stood and spoke here to-day, the Chief Executive of the Nation. No man in the Nation has a higher regard for the men who toil, and no man in the Nation will go further than he to see that they have justice always everywhere and at all times. And yet if one were to have listened to the speech of the gentleman from Alabama without knowledge of the President's message and were to believe what the gentleman said in his extravagant statements, one might imagine that the President had gone out of his way to express views unfavorable to the workingman and inimical to his interests. I do not know when I have heard in the same length of time so many extravagant and misleading statements as those made by the gentleman from Alabama. He says that he does not hold any brief for labor unions. I do, for I believe in them. I think they have accomplished a great good in America. The President of the United States believes in them, and has all his life, and expresses and emphasizes that belief in his message here to-day. The gentleman from Alabama says he never was engaged in any occupation that was unionized. I do not know that I ever heard of a union of the demagogues. I do not know whether the gentleman from Alabama ever actually worked or not. I have. I know what it is to toil, to work hard at heavy work, long hours, and I am the better physically and, I hope, mentally and morally because of that experience.

The labor unions of this Nation and of the world are essential in these days of combination, and the President realizes it as much as any man who lives. The harangue of the gentleman from Alabama was hung on the fact that the President in his message called attention to a fact that is becoming more and more recognized by all classes of our citizens in connection with industrial troubles, and that is the interest of the great body of the people. I know of no union man, and I know many well, who does not recognize the interest of the people generally in all of the questions and all of the problems of labor and employment. Labor has its best ally when its contention is first in a sympathetic public opinion. Who shall say that the public and the best part of the public, that portion we are pledged most faithfully to protect, has not, for instance, an interest in a milk-wagon drivers' strike? Who shall say that there may be industrial unrest and distress developing into strikes or lockouts without the public having a great interest in the outcome? I know of no man devoted to labor or its organizations who does not realize the public interest in labor problems. There is ground for real difference of opinion as to how the public shall express and make potent its great interest and influence in the settlement of these questions. The President has made a suggestion along lines that have been pursued to a certain extent in various parts of the country, suggestions that are entitled to careful consideration by every thoughtful man. I do not know how much labor is organized down in the country of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON]; until quite recently labor organizations have not been encouraged down there. In the country I represent organizations are the rule and serious difficulties between organized labor and employers have been, thank heaven, largely the exception. Differences will arise. Surely no man within the sound of my voice but desires to have them settled otherwise than in the interest of those most intimately concerned and of the people affected. Such a settlement will be in the interest of the country as a whole.

There are not, there should not be, there must not be, in America a division into classes.

The time must never come when a boy or girl born anywhere in America may not properly and hopefully and expectantly aspire to any position, any station, or any place in the Republic. The time must never come when there shall be a class who labor in one particular employment through the generations. The door of hope and opportunity has always been open, and must always remain open; and no man exerts a more potent influence toward closing it than he who indulges in demagogic appeals to class prejudice and class hate. We have established in America a standard higher than that prevailing anywhere else on earth, and under our system of government, under our laws, and under our policies, thank God, there is not a boy anywhere or a girl anywhere in this country who may not hopefully, expectantly, and with confidence aspire to any place in the gift of the people, any position of honor or influence. We are proud that it is so, and it shall be so so long as we treat these questions frankly and fairly; it will cease to be so when the sort of prejudice and exaggeration indulged in here this afternoon shall become general throughout the land and have borne its inevitable fruit. [Applause.]

As one who believes that a home and land owning citizenship is essential to the welfare of the Nation, and that we have reached the period in our development in which continuous and organized efforts are essential to combat the tendency toward city life and turn the hearts of men back to life on the land, I have listened with great interest and satisfaction to the President's reference to the possibility of splendid development through irrigation of arid lands and the reclamation of swamp and overflowed lands. As we reduce our expenditure for implements and establishments of war, we may well begin the expenditure of reasonable sums for work of development.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired. The gentleman from Wyoming has consumed 66 minutes and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] has consumed 96 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have taken the floor simply to call attention to a communication received by me from a gentleman of distinction, a publicist and educator, one who has founded a school and who has done more for the promotion of the welfare of his people than any other one man that I know of in the city of Philadelphia. At his own expense he visited the Canal Zone and has made a report upon certain discriminations that are practiced there which ought to be called to the public attention, so that if possible a remedy should be applied.

I desire, Mr. Chairman, simply with this introduction, to present a report by Dr. Matthew Anderson as part of my remarks and have it inserted in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to include as a part of his remarks a certain address. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The report referred to is as follows:

A PRIVATE INVESTIGATION OF DISCRIMINATIONS BETWEEN COLORED AND WHITE EMPLOYEES ON THE PANAMA CANAL ZONE.

(By Matthew Anderson, D. D.)

For some time my attention has been called, both by the public press and from private sources, to the discrimination to which the colored employees of the Canal Zone are being subjected. My interest in my people led me this last summer, at my own expense, to visit the zone for the purpose of a personal investigation of these charges.

I arrived at the zone, after a delightful sail, on the 24th of August, and began my investigations at once, without making any public announcement of the object of my visit; proceeded practically incognito. I made a number of trips on the zone, going its whole length, interviewing a score or more on the subject in question, official and laymen, colored and white, so I feel prepared to make the following statements of fact:

It might be explained at the outset that employees on the zone are classified as gold and silver, gold meaning all citizens of the United States, silver all non-United States citizens. However, there are many whites admitted to the gold division who are not citizens of the United States.

First. As above stated, employees on the Canal Zone are divided into two classes, namely, gold and silver. The commissaries—places managed by the Government for the sale of foodstuffs and clothing—also are likewise classified. Silver employees are forbidden to make purchases in a gold commissary, but gold employees are permitted to purchase in both gold and silver commissaries. Servants of gold employees, usually colored, are permitted to make purchases in gold commissaries, but only for their employers, and they are segregated even for this to a small space, the goods being handed to them from the various departments of the store by the clerks in charge. It is also a fact that the silver commissaries are the recipients of all unsold stock or leftovers of the gold commissary. The custom is to place at all times inferior articles in the silver commissary, but the silver employee, the patron, largely, of the silver commissary, is asked the very identical price that is asked of the gold employee for the fresh and better grade of provision.

Second. The towns and living quarters are also classified as gold and silver, inhabited and used, naturally, by gold and silver employees. Usually a town is strictly gold or strictly silver, each gold town having an adjoining silver town, and each gold town showing evidences of this marked discrimination in point of quarters, upkeep, and general appearance. Quarters are usually frame, built two stories high, cottage style, surrounding open veranda, screened and well ventilated, grass plats, the dimensions being 72 by 45, intended for the use of four families in a gold town, with no rent; but a building of the same dimensions in a silver town is intended for 12 families, and then it is at times without any plumbing, and if any plumbing, it is inadequate. These quarters are leased to the silver employees at the rate of $5 per family per month, payable always in advance, netting $60 a month against not one cent of rent for the gold quarters. In a gold town the grass plats and roads are kept in excellent condition, while generally very little attention is given to the appearance of the grass and condition of roadways in the silver towns.

Third. As to wages, the same discrimination appears. A gold employee is paid from 90 cents to $1.50 per hour, pays nothing for transit to and from his work. A silver employee, doing the self-same work, is paid but 23 cents to 31 cents per hour; he must pay for his transit to and from work and is allowed no holidays except those purely legal. After the recent strike against this discrimination of wages the silver employees' wages were further reduced. If gold and silver employees are detailed to do work at a distance the gold employee is paid for his time during transit, but the silver employee is not.

Fourth. The United States post offices do not escape this practice of discrimination. There is not a post office on the zone from Cristobal, on the Atlantic end, to Balboa Heights, on the Pacific end, a distance of 50 miles, where a silver employee can purchase a stamp at the same window a gold employee makes his purchase. This is rigidly enforced in all post offices.

Fifth. There are 10 Young Men's Christian Associations on the zone, established and directed by the Government. Since the recent war these have been converted into community clubhouses—five gold and five silver. The salaries received by the gold secretaries is from $200 to $350 per month, while the salaries received by the silver secretaries is from $112.50 to $150 per month. It is generally admitted that a gold clubhouse rarely shows a balance at the end of the month and that the silver clubhouses are self-supporting. The gold clubhouses are, however, equipped far better than the silver clubhouses, having paid assistants, physical directors, swimming pools, popular and up-to-date libraries, etc.

Sixth. The same discrimination is prevalent in regard to the schools of the gold and silver towns. The gold towns have well-equipped and regulated schools, carrying a child through the elementary and high school grades. The schools provided for the silver employees' children are limited to the elementary grades. A father who has a bright and ambitious son—silver employee—complained that he had been compelled to have his son take the eighth-grade work over for three consecutive years rather than leave him run idle in the streets. Just while I am writing a girl of teen age came in, and when I asked if she were going to school her reply was that she had finished the elementary schools and that was all that was open to her on the zone. It is greatly to be regretted that there is no provision whatever for vocational education on the zone for the children of the silver employee.

It might be added in plainer description of the classification of the two groups of employees and towns that the terms gold and silver are practically synonymous with the words white and colored. This gives the casual observer a keener insight into the real meaning of the terms gold and silver.

There is a growing feeling of discontent and unrest on the part of the colored employees because of these discriminations.

INTERVIEW BETWEEN COL. JAY J. MORROW, GOVERNOR OF CANAL ZONE, AND DR. MATTHEW ANDERSON.

Dr. ANDERSON. Gov. Morrow, I take pleasure in presenting you these letters of indorsement of myself from three leading citizens of Philadelphia, namely, the Hon. J. Hampton Moore, mayor of the city of Philadelphia; the Hon. John Wanamaker; and the Hon. GEORGE S. GRAHAM, Member of Congress, each of whom I am sure you know.

Gov. MORROW. Yes, Dr. Anderson; I know these gentlemen personally.

Dr. ANDERSON. I came to the Canal Zone for three specific reasons: First, to spend my vacation; second, to visit my son-in-law, Mr. J. E. Waller, who has charge of one of the clubhouses on the zone, and his wife, my daughter; and third, to investigate personally the reported discriminations shown to the colored employees on the zone. It has been repeatedly reported in Philadelphia by the public press, by letter, and by persons visiting the zone that there is the most cruel discrimination in the treatment of the colored employees on the zone.

Gov. MORROW. Why, Dr. Anderson, there is no discrimination on the Canal Zone between the white and colored employees but what can be shown to be perfectly wise and just.

Dr. ANDERSON. Gov. Morrow, I arrived at the zone August 24 and commenced immediately a private investigation. During the two weeks since my arrival I have interviewed scores of employees, white and colored, and have discovered that discriminations alleged to exist are found in the following instances:

SECRETARIES OF CLUBHOUSES.

Dr. ANDERSON. The silver or colored secretaries receive from $112.50 to $150 per month salary, while the gold or white secretaries receive from $200 to $350 per month salary. A short while ago the gold or white secretaries received a great deal more than this, but even since they have suffered a reduction they are getting as much as twice the amount of salary received by the silver or colored secretaries.

The GOVERNOR. Dr. Anderson, we can not give the colored secretaries the same as the white; it requires more for the white secretaries to live than it does the colored; it is a question wholly of economics.

COMMISSARIES.

Dr. ANDERSON. A silver or colored employee can not make purchases in the gold commissary, but a gold or white employee can make purchases in both. Until recently the secretaries of the silver or colored clubhouses could not make purchases at the gold commissary, but by virtue of the fact that they are citizens of the United States they contended that they should have the same rights as other United States citizens. Now they can make purchases in the gold commissaries, but all other colored men and women are debarred from making purchases in gold commissaries. I am told that the food sold in silver commissaries is inferior to that sold in the gold commissaries.

The GOVERNOR. Dr. Anderson, the food is not inferior; it is exactly the same in both. Your informants are wrong.

Dr. ANDERSON. Well, I am told, Governor, that all stale and leftover products of the gold commissaries are sold out at the silver commissary.

The GOVERNOR. If that is true, Dr. Anderson, though I am afraid it is not, the silver employees do not pay the same price as the gold.

Dr. ANDERSON. I am told, Mr. Governor, that the price is exactly the same and that there is no reduction.

The GOVERNOR. If that is true, Dr. Anderson, then we must investigate the matter.

WAGES.

Dr. ANDERSON. You are paying the colored or silver skilled laborer from 23 cents to 50 cents per hour, while you pay the white skilled laborer from $1 to $1.50 per hour for practically the same work.

The GOVERNOR. No; that is not quite right; we are paying the colored from 21 cents to 31 cents per hour and the white from 90 cents to $1.25 per hour.

Dr. ANDERSON. Well, don't you see, Governor, that you are paying the white or gold employees four times as much an hour as you are paying the colored?

The GOVERNOR. Dr. Anderson, as I stated, this is wholly a question of economics; these colored employees are not worth any more; they are Barbadians, Jamaicans, Cubans, who were never used to the treatment we are giving them; they had no such accommodations and got the lowest kind of wages in their homes; we are paying them a great deal more than they got at their homes. They are all very lazy people; four of these men can't do as much as one Negro from the United States. Why, Dr. Anderson, I have seen six big stalwart fellows from Jamaica struggling to lift a hand car off the tracks, when two Negroes from the United States could have taken that same car and thrown it 20 feet.

Dr. ANDERSON. Yet, Governor, you pay colored skilled laborers from the United States the same low wages received by the laborers from the islands.

POST OFFICES.

Dr. ANDERSON. Is it true, Governor, that a colored man can not purchase a stamp at the same window where a white man purchases at any post office from Cristobal on the Atlantic end to Balboa Heights on the Pacific end of the zone?

The GOVERNOR. Dr. Anderson, we could not have it otherwise. If the colored people would attempt to have service from the same windows that the whites patronize, why there would be an uprising on the zone. These people were always used to being separated in this way. Take the Jamaicans and Barbadians, they have always been separated, Dr. Anderson. Go and see for yourself.

Dr. ANDERSON. Mr. Governor, I beg your pardon, sir, for I have been to Jamaica. I have been in Kingston, their capital city, where I visited all their large stores, in which is found colored clerks. The same in their banks, and in their post offices. In the largest post office of Kingston nearly all the clerks are colored. There exists no discrimination at these post offices.

Why, Mr. Governor, the thing that surprises me most on the zone is that some of the principal clerks you have in responsible positions on the zone are West Indians, men doing valuable service, too, for I have seen them.

Governor, how many gold employees have you on the zone?

The GOVERNOR. Oh, about 7,000, including the women and children.

Dr. ANDERSON. They are principally from the South, aren't they? But you have a great many more silver employees than gold?

The GOVERNOR. Yes; certainly, we have.

Dr. ANDERSON. Now, Governor, I can not see how there would possibly be an uprising against the colored people because of their receiving their mail and stamps at the same window as the whites when there never has been such discrimination in Panama, right at the door of your executive offices, where there is not a vestige of discrimination. Yesterday, Governor, by appointment I called upon the president of Panama. I went to see him to know what openings could be made in Panama for educated and ambitious young Negroes from the United States. He received me most courteously, and we talked the matter over, and I am to write him further concerning our conference when I get home. While in Panama I sought a place to dine. I was directed to one of the best hotels in the city. I was taken into the center of the dining room and served without any questions asked. This proves to me, Governor, that there would be no opposition on the part of the Panamanians and surely none by the silver employees; this would leave only the gold employees to make an uprising.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

Dr. ANDERSON. The schools for the silver or colored employees' children are confined wholly to the work of the elementary grades, while the schools for the gold or white employees' children cover the work of both the elementary and high schools.

(The governor made no comment on this discrimination in the schools.)

LIVING QUARTERS.

Dr. ANDERSON. Governor, the quarters which are put up for the whites are two stories high, 72 feet by 45 feet in dimension, divided up for four families, two on the first and two on the second floor. These quarters are modern in their appointments and furnishings. The buildings furnished for the colored are of the same dimensions as those for the whites, but 12 colored families are required to occupy each building instead of 4 as in the white quarters. The plumbing in the colored quarters, where there is any, is very inadequate. The colored families have to pay $5 in advance monthly, or $60 for the building monthly, while the white families pay no rent whatsoever.

The GOVERNOR. Dr. Anderson, these people have far superior living quarters to those they had in their own countries, as they lived practically in dugouts in Jamaica. Look at the living quarters of the Jamaicans who live in Panama—why there is a family in every room, and they are perfectly satisfied.

Dr. ANDERSON. But, do you think this is the way to elevate the people, Governor?

Governor MORROW. Well, as I have already said, this is a question wholly of economics.

Dr. ANDERSON. Please accept my thanks, Governor, for the kind way in which you have received me and for the courteous consideration you have given to what I have had to say.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BRENNAN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. BRENNAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, two notable addresses were made yesterday by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CHALMERS] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ADOLPHUS P. NELSON] upon the subject of the proposed improvement and deepening of the St. Lawrence River which has been suggested as the most practicable method of connecting the Great Lakes with the Atlantic Ocean. It would be presumptuous and futile for me to seek to add anything to the thoroughness, the erudition, and the technical correctness of their remarks. But opposition to the St. Lawrence project has been voiced yesterday and to-day by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON]. It seems proper that their contentions should be answered at this time.

As yet no bill has been introduced in Congress looking to the authorization of the St. Lawrence proposal. We are still awaiting the report of the International Joint Commission, to which was delegated by the Governments of the United States and Canada the duty to inquire into the feasibility and propriety of the proposal. Eighteen States in this country, stretching from the State of Michigan to the coast, have linked themselves together by legislative act or Executive order into the Great Lakes-Tidewater Association. We believe it is not premature to lay before Congress at this time certain of the fundamental arguments which we believe warrant and demand the immediate authorization of this improvement.

Within the past few months certain restricted sections of this country have deemed it to be to their selfish interests to spread propaganda unfavorable to the cooperation by our Government in the building of this ship canal. It seems particularly opportune that this propaganda be answered and that the Members of Congress be asked to retain an open mind until the report of the International Joint Commission has been filed, and until we have had the opportunity of receiving and examining all of the facts having to do with this project.

The first and natural inquiry which many Members of the House, who have given only passing consideration to this proposition, have voiced, is: "Why should the West and the Middle West seek a water outlet through a foreign land?" And it was almost asserted by the gentleman from South Carolina that the patriotism of certain sections of this country was greater than the patriotism of us of the Middle West, because we were willing and anxious to have the authorization made of this project which would give us an outlet to the sea through Canada.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRENNAN. Not until I have finished.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman has made a statement which, I am sure, when he reads my remarks, which I will not change, will be found to be entirely without foundation. I made no such intimation that there was any want of patriotism at all.

Mr. BRENNAN. I think that the suggestion has been made that certain parts of this country were not willing under any circumstances to authorize improvements in a foreign land, carrying with it the implication that those of us who are interested in this project possibly are not influenced by the same considerations of Americanism.

Now, gentlemen, I think it is only self-evident that we of the Middle West have no greater desire to expend money in Canada than the gentlemen of the South or the gentlemen of the Southwest or gentlemen from any other part of the country. If the St. Lawrence River ran through the State of New York, we would not be here seeking congressional authorization of a project which requires the cooperation of a foreign dominion. But, fortunately or otherwise, nature saw fit to place the St. Lawrence River in the Dominion of Canada rather than in the United States. We are interested only in obtaining for the West the advantages of the most direct, the most practicable, the most economical, the most serviceable water outlet that is offered.

The sad experience of the past has taught us that we must have at least one through route to the sea which may be used by Lake and ocean vessels without the necessity of transshipping and rehandling cargoes at inland points as at present. We seek only the most feasible solution of our present aggravating transportation problems and an avoidance of the interminable delays and expenses which are incident to our present transportation facilities.

We have investigated the possibility of using the Mississippi, and we are using it to-day freely and gladly. But no one has seriously suggested deepening the Mississippi so that it would be navigable by ocean going vessels of 25-foot draft. The Mississippi River will always be efficiently used by barges and other craft of limited draft. It will always supplement the ship canal when the latter is built. But it should not be regarded as a competitor of or substitute for the latter. The two offer entirely different methods of transportation which in no way conflict with each other but rather harmonize and dovetail with each other. The West and the country need both. We have also investigated the existing New York Barge Canal recently completed and the possibility of the construction of a ship canal through the State of New York. I was one of those who had the privilege of inspecting the St. Lawrence River route last summer with a number of Congressmen, and more recently I made a trip of inspection over the New York Barge Canal.

The New York Barge Canal is finished. Its greatest depth is 12 feet. It can be used only by barges and by other vessels of the more primitive type. The greater St. Lawrence waterway has not yet been started. But even now there is a through channel of 14 feet through the St. Lawrence from Lake Ontario to the sea. Last summer a commodious vessel, carrying a party of over 200, together with the crew, gave an actual demonstration of the present facilities and afforded a view of the unlimited possibilities if a comparatively small amount of money is expended in deepening this natural waterway. We were given a visual demonstration of what the engineers had already advised us. The United States Army engineers and other expert authorities have considered and compared the various routes which have been suggested, and are almost unanimous in their findings that the St. Lawrence River is the natural and obvious outlet from the Lakes. As compared with other routes, they approve of it because the engineering problems presented are simpler, because the initial cost would be immeasurably less, and because the eventual facilities of navigation and water power offered will be immeasurably greater.

We are committed to the St. Lawrence route not because we love Canada the more and the State of New York the less, but because we love the United States the more and believe that the supposed interests of one small section of the country should not stand in the way of the greater good of the balance of the country. It must be appreciated that the 18 great States which have associated themselves together in behalf of this project would not espouse it unless they were persuaded and convinced that no feasible route, lying entirely within American territory, existed. It should be remembered that the improvement of a waterway does not necessarily benefit the people along its shores more than it benefits the people served at its termini. The people in the Republic of Panama, of course, receive certain incidental benefits from the Panama Canal, but its great advantages redound to the people of our Atlantic and Pacific seaboards, and to a certain extent to the people in our interior, thousands of miles from the canal. If a narrow strip of land similar to the Isthmus of Panama and separating the Atlantic from the Pacific Ocean had lain within the territory of the United States, no doubt it would have been utilized in place of the route through Panama. But because no other water route from San Francisco to New York was practicable except a route through Central America we found it necessary and feasible to authorize and construct the Panama Canal.

It should not be thought for a moment that the entire Dominion of Canada is enthusiastically in favor of cooperating with us in improving the St. Lawrence. The city of Montreal seems to fear that it might be displaced as an ocean port and a number of its people are opposing this improvement, even though it would pass in front of its door.

But we are not disheartened because of the opposition voiced by a certain few in Canada. We are disappointed at what appears to be the attitude of a number of people in New York City. To some of us it seems in poor taste that the metropolis of this country, which has received so much from Congress in the past in the way of development of its port and harbor facilities, should now come here in the attitude of an obstructionist, should come here and attempt to dictate to the Middle West and to tell us that we should be forever required to send all of our products through the neck of the transportation bottle located at New York.

Mr. Chairman, last summer the Committee on Rivers and Harbors inspected the port of the city of New York. We were told that New York City is desirous of obtaining substantial appropriations from Congress for further deepening and improving its harbor. We know, of course, that in the past the metropolis has rightfully received more money, many times more money, than any other of the large harbors of this country.

And we expect in the future to appropriate further sums to improve that magnificent port. And yet in doing so we can not close our eyes to the almost intolerable congestion which has existed for years past in the vicinity of New York City and which is particularly emphasized on the lower end of Manhattan Island. New York City also recognizes that this congestion will soon become unbearable. The solution which it offers is the diverting of some of its commerce and traffic from Manhattan Island proper to Staten Island and Long Island. The municipality is making extensive improvements in the way of building piers on Staten Island and at Jamaica Bay. And while asking Congress to further deepen and improve the harbor, it finds it would be necessary to create artificial land upon which to build the piers to serve the harbor. All of this artificial development can result in spreading the congestion only over a few extra square miles, and within 25 years at best the last error will be worse than the first. We sometimes wonder whether some of New York's representatives are bespeaking the best interests of their own district when they insist that the West shall continue forever to pour its unlimited commerce into the narrow confines of the great metropolis. Can we be criticized for asking a transportation relief which would divert a part of our shipments through another route which would be uninterrupted and unhampered by the necessary rehandlings and breaking of bulk which now attend shipments through Buffalo and New York City?

But we are told by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] that the time is not ripe, that we should wait, that this is not the time to come to Congress and ask for new projects. That warning has a familiar ring. We heard the same cry before this country was plunged into war. Because some preached in 1914 and 1915 that the time was not ripe for preparedness the country in 1917 entered the war unprepared. We can thank the valor of our soldiers rather than our own foresight for the victorious outcome. The armistice came suddenly, and we entered peace as unprepared for it as we had been unprepared for the conflict. For a few months after the ending of hostilities the wheels of industry whirled with artificial speed. But soon the fires burned out and the country lapsed into a period of almost unprecedented depression. Now we are seeking to work our way back to normalcy. Many of us believe that we have turned the corner and that the return of prosperity is in sight. Within a few months, or within a year at best, the manufacturers and the producers of the country will again be working to capacity, and we will need all of our present transportation facilities and much more if we hope to transport and deliver the products of our industry. Let us profit by our past experiences and not enter into this new period entirely unprepared for prosperity.

It is not necessary to go back many months to recall when we of the West were unable to get coal, were unable to get lumber or gasoline or other necessary materials, and were unable to move our grain or our manufactured products. We in Detroit were obliged to drive our motor vehicles overland to seaboard in order to ship them overseas. We were obliged to render them secondhand in order to deliver them. Why? Not through choice, but only because our factories, which turned out from 4,000 to 7,000 automobiles per day, could not find freight cars or other agencies of transportation with which to deliver them to our customers. We ask in justice to ourselves and to the prosperity of the entire country that we not be compelled to repeat these experiences forever.

Recently I heard a gentleman who opposed the St. Lawrence Ship Canal make the analogy that the United States is like a farmer who has built a barn upon his own land, the barn being the New York Barge Canal, and that it would be the height of folly for that farmer, having spent a large sum upon his own barn, to go upon his neighbor's land and build another barn there to use in place of his own. It seemed to me that the analogy would have been more accurate if he had suggested that the Middle West is like a farmer whose farm is landlocked, who has one narrow, muddy, and uncertain road to the market, and who seeks a more appropriate outlet.

A canal should not be compared to a barn or warehouse. It is a thoroughfare. We of the Middle West have one limited thoroughfare, the New York Barge Canal, which we are glad to use and are using wherever we can, where its restricted facilities will permit. We are aware that our neighbor to the north has a natural and better thoroughfare and that it is willing that we should cooperate in using it. Are we not like the farmer whose neighbor says to him, "You have no means of getting to market except a tortuous, narrow roadway, while I have here on my land a fine, natural road which requires some improvement. I am willing and glad to let you use my road if you will cooperate with me and help me pave it so that we can both get our goods to market"? The landlocked farmer, before expending money upon his neighbor's land, would be protected by a contract giving him a perpetual right to use it as a right of way. So we would be protected by a treaty with the Dominion of Canada which would forever protect our investment.

We have heard many praiseworthy expressions by Members of this House within the past few weeks with regard to the accomplishments and expected accomplishments of the disarmament conference. Some of us have had occasion to point to the friendly relations which have existed between the United States and Canada for over 100 years. To me it seems unfortunate that anyone should oppose this great international improvement upon military grounds.

Our dealings with Canada for generations have been predicated upon a continuation of our friendly relations. If they had been predicated upon a possible war we would never have deepened or improved the Detroit River, the St. Clair River, St. Marys River, or any of the other channels which separate our country from Canada. And to-day the great body of water known as the Great Lakes would have been useless for purposes of navigation because of a few unimproved channels which happened to lie upon the international boundary line. I do not believe that a majority of this Congress will ever approve a departure from our traditional policy with reference to Canada, or will ever refuse to authorize a peace-time project merely because some one has raised a cry, equally unjustified and impolitic, of a war which never can occur. I hope it will never become necessary to present to this House further answer to the war contention unfortunately already voiced. But if this necessity arises the proponents of the St. Lawrence project will be ready to show that if the inconceivable should happen and war should occur the existence of the improved St. Lawrence Canal could in no way operate against the military interests of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. WALSH. For a moment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. There was yesterday an agreement privately entered into, but publicly stated, that two hours for general debate should be occupied on that side of the Chamber, controlled by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], and an hour on this side. Two hours were used by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], and I also yielded out of the hour that was given to this side some time to gentlemen on that side. That difference was to be evened up to-day. There are two speeches yet remaining on this side and one extension. It seems to me that unless we can have the assurance that on a subsequent day, and at a very early date, the gentlemen on this side may have the time that was agreed upon, it would be very unfair to make a point of no quorum and force an adjournment at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Wyoming has consumed 78 minutes and the gentleman from Tennessee 96 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman from Tennessee desires to yield the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] 10 minutes, and I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will withhold his point of order until the gentleman has spoken, if he desires.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not want any misunderstanding, but the gentleman from New York has not spoken to me for time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts make the point of order?

Mr. WALSH. I want to ask the gentleman from Wyoming if it is his purpose that this motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is likely to be repeated to-morrow?

Mr. MONDELL. That motion would scarcely be in order, as to-morrow is Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. WALSH. Unless we should dispense with the business on Calendar Wednesday, and I did not know but that the gentleman intended to ask unanimous consent for that this evening.

Mr. MONDELL. I did not intend to.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, Mr. Chairman, it seems like cruelty to deprive the country of the valuable information that is being imparted to it in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to-day and was imparted to us on these very important problems yesterday, none of which as far as I know are the subject of any legislation, but if the gentleman has some more information of a kindred nature which he thinks should be imparted I will withhold the point for a few moments.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am glad the gentleman has withdrawn it, because I was anxious to find out just how many in the future I would have to go to to make an agreement effective. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee of the Whole House, Byron, in his immortal "Monody on the death of Richard Brinsley Sheridan," in unequaled lyrical pathos sings of the exalted oratory and unrivaled rhetoric of the distinguished Irish orator, whose eloquence and soul-stirring denunciation of those who misruled "trampled Hindustan" "shook the nations" and made even Warren Hastings, who was the defendant in the impeachment proceedings, wipe away the tears of regret for the atrocities with which he stood charged.

I have often wondered whether this House would be patient after a long and strenuous day of general debate with Sheridan himself were the shades of the ever-venerated and illustrious dead permitted to return to the scenes of their triumphs and disasters. Of one thing I am certain: I am not a Sheridan, and at this late hour in the evening it would be an act of folly if I attempted to hold you here with a lengthy address. Even if I were gifted with the divine afflatus and could inspire you by graceful rhetorical flourishes, I would be loath to take advantage of the power of such a blessing. I will therefore crave your indulgence for a few moments only. There are some things dear to my soul and when they are discussed I can not but rise and have my say. Permit me, therefore, to indorse in a few words the splendid expressions of JIM GALLIVAN on the bonus bill that must be passed in the interest of the national honor.

His sentiments and his hopes for the soldiers and sailors that we offered as a "holocaust to their country's need," soldiers and sailors who were willing to do, dare, and die for our country when the whole world was staggering before the terrific onslaught of the Germany Army, are my sentiments and my hopes. You remember, for it is an unforgetable chapter in the history of the United States of America, that the cry came to us from over the ocean, from reeling England and from heroic France, from the blood-soaked battle fields and trenches, "Save us, or the Hun will soon be at your gate, the vandal will soon be in your homes. Save us or we, you, and our civilization will soon be a memory. Save us, for God's sake." We answered that cry, uttered in heart-breaking tones, and we did save the world! But to do so we had to suffer our Golgotha, we had to slowly and wearily ascend Calvary, we had to offer and surrender forever many of our glorious youths to the Moloch of war. As the offered victims that were to secure the preservation of their country and the hopes of the world, our youth gladly went to the sacrifice singing hosannas and pæns of triumph. They swung across the great abyss lightly feeling that they would be intrenched in the hearts and affections of their countrymen forever more. For we had all promised them as they left our schoolhouses and assembly places for the seaside to take ship and cross the ocean that we never, never would forget them! JIM GALLIVAN, who is as attractive a personality as he is an earnest advocate of the cause he loves, is loyal to the soldiers and sailors of America, and I am glad, I repeat, to stand up for a few moments here and indorse his magnificent stand. Blessed by nature with a grateful heart and responsive to sentimental affections, he hearkens to the cry of our boys to-day just as he gloried in their dauntless courage when they were crossing the great sea to fight and defeat those who would bring fire and the sword to our shores if they were not stopped on the fields of France.

A splendid address. Bold, gallant, courageous JIM GALLIVAN, as true to-day in your fight for a bonus for our soldiers as you were brave in your words when bidding them farewell as they left the land of their birth, perhaps never to return. Splendid words you have uttered to-day; words that I hope will keep alive the romance of the World War. Like you, I can never forget our boys. Their triumphs have aroused in me memories of other wars, memories that I acquired in my school days of the part played by American valor in the long ago; the part played by American soldiers who long since journeyed to their final home. I will tell you a story of one of these American soldiers who was only a private on the battle field, but one of the commanding figures at all times in the cause of humanity and whose name is inscribed upon the hearts of the school children of two great cities of the American Union. For this soldier of the War of 1812 left the fortune he accumulated in after years to the cities of Baltimore and New Orleans for the education of the poor and the lowly as he knew the children of his day when our country was not an opulent country and when public schools were not so plentifully scattered over what is now a smiling land. But the hour is late, the sun has long since set and we are weary with the strife. Let me tell you his story as I told it to the board of trustees and the principal of the McDonogh High School, located in Maryland, when I had the honor to be the guest of that great institution and on which occasion I spoke to many of the finest men and women in proud old Maryland—men and women who had come into that temple of education to do honor to the memory of the soldier who was no more, John McDonogh, patriot, philosopher, philanthropist, and Christian gentleman, whose work and whose life should be an inspiration to the youth of our land through the centuries that lie ahead, for his rules for the guidance of life will be as true a thousand years from now as they were on the day that they were written by his now cold and pulseless hand. I will insert that address in this few minutes' talk, and I hope you will read it in the morning:

SPEECH DELIVERED ON MCDONOGH DAY BY JAMES O'CONNOR, AT BALTIMORE, MD.

Down in southern Louisiana, across the Mississippi River from New Orleans, is one of the old towns of this country. It is affectionately referred to as McDonoghville. In that town is a cemetery, and in that cemetery is a tomb where once rested the remains of John McDonogh. Who was John McDonogh? The answer is partially found in the following inscription that appears upon the east front of the now empty sarcophagus:

"Sacred to the memory of John McDonogh. Born in Baltimore, State of Maryland, December 29, 1779; died in the town of McDonogh, State of Louisiana, October 26, 1850.

"WRITTEN BY HIMSELF.

"Here lies the body of John McDonogh, of the city of New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana, one of the United States of America; the son of John and Elizabeth McDonogh, of Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, also one of the United States of America; awaiting in full and firm faith the resurrection and the coming of his glorious Lord, Redeemer, and Master to judge the world."

How did he live his life? The answer will be found on the north and south sides, which reads:

"RULES FOR THE GUIDANCE OF MY LIFE IN 1804.

"Remember always that labor is one of the conditions of our existence.

"Time is gold; throw not one minute away, but place each one to account.

"Do unto all men as you would be done by.

"Never put off till to-morrow what you can do to-day.

"Never bid another to do what you can do yourself.

"Never covet what is not your own.

"Never think any matter so trivial as not to deserve notice.

"Never give out that which does not first come in.

"Never spend but to produce.

"Let the greatest order regulate the transactions of your life.

"Study in the course of your life to do the greatest possible amount of good.

"MCDONOGH."

INSCRIPTION ON SOUTH SIDE.

"Deprive yourself of nothing necessary to your comfort, but live in an honorable simplicity and frugality.

"Labor, then, to the last moment of your existence.

"Pursue strictly the above rules, and the Divine blessing and riches of every kind will flow upon you to your heart's content; but first of all remember that the first and great study of your life should be to tend, by all the means in your power, to the honor and glory of the Divine Creator.

"MCDONOGH.

"NEW ORLEANS, March 2, 1804.

"The conclusion of which I have arrived is that without temperance there is no health, without virtue no order, without religion no happiness, and the sum of our being is to live wisely, soberly, and righteously."

The vast majority of men live their lives upon this earth before they cross to that bourne from whence no traveler ever returns. There are some few, however, in every generation who in carrying out the Divine will remain dead to the world, but still in its midst during their lifetime, and only begin to speak to us in language eloquent after receiving the summons from on high to appear before the great white throne of God. Then they begin to exert a powerful influence upon those left behind to play out their parts in the grand drama of life. The many speak with their tongues and their pens; a few brave, heroic, self-sacrificing souls speak through their immortal deeds long after their tongues are silent and their pens are rust.

All over this country from ocean to ocean and from the Lakes to the Gulf, in every village, town, hamlet, and city, will be found in that most mournful place on earth, the cemetery, monuments erected by a great fraternal and benevolent association to commemorate the virtues of those of its members who have made the great journey of adventure, who have swung across the great abyss, each monument carrying the inscription "Dum Tacet Clamat"—"Though silent, he still speaks." This is but an evidence of the fact that mankind does and will continue to reverence in the years that are to come as it has in the centuries that first began their flight at Creation's dawn and are now rolled into eternity, the noble efforts of men and women to win the gratitude of succeeding generations, and bring themselves "Nearer, my God, to Thee."

For the members of this great organization are not the great and powerful of the Republic. They are in a vast majority of cases obscure, unknown, and lowly, and live their lives far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife. But a membership in this magnificent order evidences a sincere desire to do noble things, not dream them all day long and so make life, death, and that vast forever one grand, sweet song. It is a recognition that great work may be performed by an obscure personality, and is based upon the theory that considering his circumscribed sphere of action he has done the best for the elevation and uplift of his fellows and of the race.

Full many a gem of purest ray serene
The dark unfathomed caves of ocean bear;
Full many a flower was born to blush unseen
And waste its sweetness on the desert air.

If the Creator will crown our efforts, to whom will He not give the crown? The little violet growing at the foot of the gigantic oak may perform as great a function in the economy of nature as the monster in the forest which withstands the wintery blast and sighs beneath the summer breeze. Who are the victors and who the vanquished in that thrilling romance called life. Who the benefactors and who the beneficiaries is not always determined by history during the lifetime of the actors, but her pen makes record of their virtues or their frailties, and in the fullness of time enters judgment through a generation that she selects for that purpose. Poor John McDonogh was despised, ridiculed, scoffed, and jeered at during his life or the greater part of it, the last lap of his terrible journey, but a succeeding generation recognized his greatness and in tears washed away the cruel attitude of those who knew not the glorious Christianity of a world benefactor; for not only the schools of Baltimore and New Orleans received his benefactions, but slaves at home, peoples of far away Liberia, orphan asylums, public parks, life, and all things that tend to make life a sweet song mindful of the glory of God received his holy attention.

Though I am not unmindful of the applause that should crown the efforts of those who live wisely and well and who bestow upon mankind their blessings before they return to the everlasting dust from which they came, I can not forget that from the very twilight of history even in times that were written in fire and blood and scalding tears soldiers stopped on their cruel marches at the thought of some one who had gone down in the smoke of battle, but who had vainly struggled through his life to make some nook of God's creation a little brighter for his presence. This veneration for one who had done noble things may be found even in Egypt's celebrated Book of the Dead written 2,000 years before Joseph was sold into captivity and long before the dawn of Judaism had begun. There you will find these splended words which are the foundation for innumerable structures in the way of benevolent and fraternal organizations guided by good men and women, who have come and gone since that far-away period in the world's history: "He hath given bread to the hungry, water to the thirsty; He hath given clothes to the naked and a boat to the shipwrecked; He hath made due offerings to the gods; He hath buried the dead." I believe that men and women ought to live their lives along the social lines required of them by the generations in which they move and have their being and see to it by will and testament that after life's flitful fever is over and they sleep well that out of accumulations of their life are distributed funds for the widows and orphans for the building of hospitals and asylums and the education of the youth of the land. But I can not withhold the honor that I believe should be theirs and the tribute that should be paid to those departed spirits who strove and who saved during a life of sacrifice and toil and moil and whose only pleasure was in dreaming the dreams that would come into a reality after they had passed into the grave as a gateway to that land which I hope is sweeter and fairer than this; who suffered the contumelious stone during their lifetime, the sneering laughter of those whose children were ever in the eye of him that they mocked. Of the latter class is the man whose memory we reverence to-day, John McDonogh; in honor of whose great works we are assembled and to whose name and fame we pay our tribute in this historic building on this memorable day. For while I do not commend you to follow in the footsteps of the great philanthropist in denying himself the pleasures of life I ask you to always remember that he lived to bless mankind and carried out his mission in accordance with what he thought was the divine order of his creator the almighty God.

As a matter of fact, ladies and gentlemen, such a commendation to any generation is seldom productive of any result, good or evil, for human beings usually pursue the lines of least resistance, and a suggestion to take the lonely road up the hill of life set with innumerable difficulties, with heartaches, with toil, anguish, and suffering falls on unheeding ears no matter what triumph and glittering prize be promised him who makes the fearful trip and journey. God moves in mysterious way His wonders to perform, and apparently for some inscrutable reason selects to accomplish some great purpose one who was born of the obscure and who in life's low vale remote pined alone until given the signal by Him to go forth on the journey that is not lined by applauding onlookers and admirers, but is crossed by numberless men and women crying "Crucify him." Their children in a succeeding generation wipe away with tears and mortification the wrong done by their parents and kinsmen to the great benefactor and philanthropist who toiled that they might enjoy and whose benefactions came as glad tidings of a great joy, making their journey free from the toil and pain which he underwent in his days for their sake. His life was the extreme of self-denial and the study of it is valuable in showing in an extreme way the eternal economic truth that there is no royal road to success; that the goal can be achieved only by work and living according to the command of God. As a matter of fact, all the men and women who have secured a place in the chronicles of time, in some measure, lived in accordance with the rules which, to McDonogh, were a cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night.

I have come to praise McDonogh and join you in reverencing his memory and praying for the happiness of his great and magnificent soul. For it must be a goodly sight in the All-seeing Eye for men and women to pray for those that have gone before them. Too frequently does it happen that those who come to pray remain to censure and condemn. May such never be my attitude during my journey through this vale of tears. De mortuis nil nisi bonum—of the dead say nothing but good.

Why did he come to New Orleans? In order to understand his breadth of vision, let me give to you the conditions as they presented themselves to pioneers. No finer chapter can be found than that of William Allen—a chapter in which he pictures what would have been the greatest city in the history of the world had not fate stepped in and caused the invention of the locomotive.

At the beginning of the present century the Gulf of Mexico was virtually an inland sea of that magnificent American empire which still remained attached to the Spanish Crown. The splendid domains of Florida and Louisiana bounded the Gulf on the north and east, and placed a barrier in that direction to the expansion of the United States, while the great territory of Louisiana, stretching up the west side of the Mississippi, distinctly marked the limits of our country on the west. The stream of immigration which had broken over the Alleghenies years before the Revolutionary War had grown rapidly after that event, and the extent, resources, and importance of the Mississippi Valley were beginning to be realized. It did not require great foresight to reach the conclusion that the whole of this great valley must soon become in some way a part of the United States. The problem of the acquisition of those parts yet under foreign control was engaging the attention of American statesmen. The speedy and peaceful solution of this problem was to be one of the achievements of the great Virginian who had put into language the feelings which moved the popular heart at the beginning of the Revolutionary struggle, and who was destined to impress his views and principles so strongly on the Government he had done so much to create.

While Mr. Jefferson and others were watching with the keenest interest the progress of affairs in Europe, awaiting the opportunity which might place the Louisiana territory within reach of acquisition, enterprising American merchants and traders were already making brave ventures to secure a share of the great and lucrative trade whose principal avenues must be the Mississippi River. The commanding position and importance of New Orleans as the destined entrepot of this commerce could not fail to strike the mind. At this time, a generation before the invention of railroads, no city on the continent seemed to have such a future before it as New Orleans. Situated near the mouth of the Mississippi, with no rival for the trade of the great valley, it seemed about to enter upon a career of commercial prosperity and growth such as nature had rendered possible to but few spots on the globe. At that day the only possible ways over which a great commerce could be carried were waterways; and the navigable waters which made their way past New Orleans to the sea penetrated every part of the finest river basin in the world, a basin immense in extent and unrivaled in productiveness of soil and salubrity of climate.

Into that great theater came John McDonogh in 1800, and from the day he arrived until his death he never left the stage. He thought New Orleans within the course of years would sweep past London, and that he would leave land which would some day be worth $500,000,000 as a foundation for the education forever of poor boys and girls. I will not dwell upon his so-called love affairs, suffice it to say that he was a part of the social life of New Orleans until he moved across the Mississippi River to his plantation, where now is the town of McDonoghville. He was intimately acquainted with all of the city officials and merchants and citizens generally and was a welcome figure in the salons of the most exclusive homes during his younger years.

Well educated, affable, and pleasing in his manners, strictly correct in his deportment and in all of his transactions, he was an attractive figure in all social and political gatherings before he retired to his country home, there to begin and conduct a correspondence with the prominent men of the Nation which was second in volume only to that of Thomas Jefferson. He was still young when the trumpet call to defend New Orleans from invasion by Packenham and the invincibles of the Peninsular wars rang out from Jackson Camp, and he at once joined a company of rifles, under Capt. Beale. On January 8, 1815, almost shoulder to shoulder with one of the greatest Indian chieftains that ever lived in the history and tradition of this continent, Pushmahata, the great orator, warrior, statesman, and rival of the celebrated Tecumseh, and with those other gallant spirits—Lafitte and Dominick You—who raised themselves from the depths, as it were, by their valor and refusal to sell their native land for gold, wrote his and their names imperishably across the chapters in that never to be forgotten period of the United States. There were giants in those days, and John McDonogh was great of statue among those heroic figures that covered themselves with glory on the Plains of Chalmette. They are no more. They have been wafted to another shore, but their deeds will be affectionately entrenched in the memory of generation after generation of Americans that will come and go, play out their parts on the banks of the Mississippi River, and then depart to meet the great ones of that day of men of renown, who fought for their native land and scorned to give aught other reason why.

The muffled drum's sad roll has beat
The soldier's last tattoo;
No more on life's parade shall meet
That brave and daring few.
On fame's eternal camping ground
Their silent tents are spread,
And glory guards will solemn round
The bivouac of the dead.

For years and years after the great battle had been fought and won the old fellows who indulged in street-corner conversation in the daytime and who sat in the wine shops at night with their big fireplaces, in which were blazing log fires, and there recited in low tones the nights of revelry following the celebrated victory, always talked of how McDonogh was a hero in the strife. In the Latin quarter and in the streets of the famous old city that were lighted by coal-oil lamps and the stars and the moon and which were given a sweet scent by the pomegranate and the night jessamine and the morning glory, the conversation was always about Jackson, of course, and the "Big Indian" and the "Big pirates," Lafitte and You, and the "Big Baltimore man," who was "sans peur sans raproache."

Yes; he was great in war and great in peace, and his really generous Nation responded at all times to the demands of his Lord and Redeemer and his countrymen. As an answer to the expressions of those who misunderstood one of the noblest figures of that day and generation, let me say that at the time of his death he owed $160,000, $100,000 of which was due the Citizens' Bank of Louisiana and the balance of $60,000 for several properties which he had purchased. He had at that time $10,500 in bank to meet this amount. Baltimore reveres the name of a splendid son and a great benefactor. New Orleans shall never forget his memory and his munificence. Annually 50,000 children and their parents gather in the historic Lafayette Square, which stretches in front of the famous old City Hall in New Orleans, and there strew flowers and garlands at the base of the pedestal on which stands the bust of the well-beloved dead. No longer misunderstood, he is affectionately entrenched in the hearts of all of our people who would attest, if necessary, with their tears their sorrows for the unhappey attitude of the generations in which John McDonogh lived. Thirty-one schoolhouses, each a monument in itself, carry his name and fame into the minds of boys and girls that are there fitting themselves for the high duty of American citizenship.

A magnificent home for destitute orphan boys conveys silently but eloquently the splendid story of him who has gone to the land where there are no orphan tears to wipe away. Also speaks out dreamily of his goodness of heart—a great magnificent park in which are to be found the finest water oaks in the world and whose enchanting mystery never fades from the mind of a beholder and where assemble every evening during the summer months forty to fifty thousand men and women—the great historic spot on which is observed the fall of the Bastile on July 14, 1789. This is also the spot where on the Fourth of July, 50,000 men and women gather to hear read the Declaration of Independence and cheer the orators who speak in glowing terms of the fadeless glory that made the young Republic and of those who have extended our frontiers so that we now phrase it "from ocean to ocean and from the Great Lakes down to the Mexican Sea." Aye, down to the great canal where the southern cross shines down on Old Glory and out into the eastern seas, and up near the Arctic Circle, where the northern lights shine above the Stars and Stripes of our native land. McDonogh's name is inseparably associated with a part of the wonderful growth of his country, for he was one of the great big giants of his day. He came to us in New Orleans as a heroic young figure and played out his part in the grand drama of life like the great American he was. He has left us for the land beyond the sky, but his memory will always remain green in the memory of men and women who cherish the recollection of those choice spirits that measured up fully to the magnificent inspiration of:

Do well thy work.
It shall succeed in thine or in another's day
And though thou lack the victor's meed,
Thou shall not want the toiler's pay.

He was unknown in the latter part of his life, but his benefactions as shown by his will and testament and which evidenced a desire to uplift the world has made his name a household word in Louisiana, particularly in the city of New Orleans, and in the city of Baltimore, Md. His name is better known to-day among the people of New Orleans than all the governors the old State has ever had, his memory is more affectionately reverenced than all the names of all the judges that ever presided in the city of New Orleans and his fame is more enduring than that of all the mayors that the old city has ever had.

My theme is ended, my song has ceased. He lives to-day and his name is clustered round with a greater glory than all others in our great city because he lived to bless mankind; because he did noble things, not dreamed them all the day long, and so made life, death, and that vast forever one grand, sweet song.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH].

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, I wish to take advantage of this splendid audience and membership this evening and to thank my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] for the opportunity of giving the country some information that I feel it should have at this time. The subject that I shall discuss, and which I have sat here these many hours with the object of discussing, is a subject that every Member who has a constituent engaged in the live-stock industry, I take it, will be interested. As is well known to every man who is engaged in that great industry, almost overnight, about 18 months ago, the industry was confronted with financial peril. This was occasioned by the high prices, for one reason, that were brought about during the war, and again it was occasioned by the Government during the war sending its agents throughout the West and the Southwest, in the great live-stock belt, urging the men who were producing cattle, sheep, hides, and meat to increase their flocks, to increase their herds. As patriotic citizens they responded to the request of their Government and went into the market and bought high-priced cattle and sheep and placed them on their ranches in order to feed our armies in Flanders and clothe the boys from the wintry blasts on the Argonne. This condition of a decline in prices continued to grow from bad to worse until—and I am violating no confidence in making this statement—about the 1st of June of this year, when it was brought to the attention of the President of the United States. Again, I say, I am violating no confidence when I state it was told to me by a gentleman who was present at that conference—and a majority of the Cabinet were there—that the President made the statement that this condition had gone beyond the local phase and had become national and that the live-stock industry of this country must not perish.

A plan was there formulated whereby the President would send to Congress a message requesting, as was done during the war, that loans be made direct to the live-stock producers of the country through the War Finance Corporation. A statement was given out through the press by the governor of the Federal reserve that this would be done—on the 8th of June. Yet the night before that statement was given out the governor of the Federal reserve left on a visit to the live-stock section of the country, to the West and to the Southwest, handing the statement to the newspaper boys to carry the message that the people there would be relieved, as they were relieved during the war, by direct loans. But the statement had hardly gotten cold in type—Gov. Harding left here on Sunday night, the 7th of June—when on Tuesday, the 8th of June, the bankers of New York and Chicago came to Washington en masse and conferred with the Secretary of the Treasury, and said to him that it was not necessary for the Government to make these loans; that they would organize a $50,000,000 pool and take care of the live-stock industry by making long-time loans at a reasonable rate of interest.

It is remarkably strange that these philanthropists, these benefactors of the live-stock producer, comprising this bankers' pool, so called, which did afterwards organize, should, over one year from the time the bottom dropped out of the live-stock industry, suddenly overnight wake up to the fact that they could take care of and would constitute themselves the guardian angels of the live-stock producers. Why was this done? I will tell you. Because, if the Government made the loans direct, then the live-stock producer would be independent of the Chicago banker when he paid the loan off; he might do his business wherever it suited him; and the finger prints of banks and loan companies of Chicago and elsewhere that had pressed down on him in times of dire distress would never press him again. The governor of the Federal reserve had hardly reached San Angelo, in my district, when a message was sent to him that the bankers' pool would take care of the live-stock industry. He had gone through that country carrying the message that the War Finance Corporation would loan the money to the cattleman on long time so he could rehabilitate himself; to the wool producer who had been getting for his wool 50 cents during the war, only to find it suddenly drop the 1st of May, 1920, to 10 and 15 cents. He was informed that they had organized the bankers' pool in Chicago. How many cattle and sheep men who really needed this money were able to secure it?

I want to say to you gentlemen here on my responsibility as a Congressman that not many live-stock producers in the great State of Texas, as far as I have heard, received very substantial benefit from this bankers' pool. Oh, yes; they loaned some money out there, but in most instances they loaned the money to men who could go to any bank in the country and borrow money—not the men whose only salvation was time, three years' time, to grow out of the condition that the war had left them in. I am not fundamentally an advocate of direct loans from the Government, but in cases of this character, where it is an aftermath of the war, where the war condition produced the situation, then let the Government come to his relief as he bravely went to his Government's relief in time of its peril. Now, my colleague and friend from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] was appointed on a special agricultural and live-stock committee, and he went into the live-stock section of our State to investigate conditions, made a trip along about the 1st of September, and he then discovered that unless relief was given to the live-stock people of that section at least 50 per cent of them would probably be in bankruptcy in a short while.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDSPETH. Yes; I will gladly yield to my friend from Kansas.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. May I suggest to the gentleman that it has been stated over and over again that the Federal reserve bank was refusing to rediscount cattle paper at that time, and was rediscounting speculative paper without limit.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I state to my friend that I think that is a mistake.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That has been stated.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The Federal reserve bank at Dallas——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I did not refer to any particular district——

Mr. HUDSPETH. Was rediscounting cattle paper and doing its best to relieve the situation, according to the information I secured up here. But the time of its rediscount loans was too short. The Government largely got us into this trouble, gentlemen, and we must be given time to get out.

Now, my friend SUMNERS made a visit to the western part of the State, where the great live-stock section is located, and he reported conditions as he found them and formulated a plan whereby, if the banks would carry 10 per cent of the responsibility, that there might be an amendment to the Norris or Kellogg bill permitting direct loans. Immediately certain gentlemen assembled in the city of Fort Worth and gave out a statement that they would organize, as has been organized since, a company, to be known as the Agricultural Livestock Finance Corporation, for the purpose of relieving the live-stock producer. You see, gentlemen, Mr. Meyer, manager of the War Finance Corporation, stating that the War Finance Corporation could not make direct loans, but desiring to relieve the depressed live-stock producer, had given out a statement to me and other Congressmen, encouraging the organization of these substantial loan companies. How? By making loans to the live-stock producer on long time, and rediscounting with the War Finance Corporation, converting the capital stock of said company into a revolving fund. Men all over the western part of Texas took stock in that corporation. Men dragged the very dregs of their pockets for a little cash in order to take stock and encourage a corporation that could, and that said it would, relieve the live-stock situation by long-time loans, and the War Finance Corporation said it would rediscount its paper. I want to state, gentlemen, as far as my observation has gone in personal contact and otherwise with the War Finance Corporation here that the gentlemen composing it have done their best and have studied conditions in the live-stock belt and have tried to meet the situation but they could not make loans, under the law, direct. Now, as I have stated, the people of that section, men who were depressed financially, had gone down in their pockets—myself and others—and taken stock, and one of my colleagues here, who does not own a cow on this earth, took stock and stated to them in a letter, so I am informed, "I bid adieu to my money for a period of a year. I want no interest for that time. I want to help sustain an industry that I fear is about to perish." Gentlemen, time was all these people required, and it was understood that this corporation that was organized at Fort Worth was organized to make loans, not on the depressed current valuation of the market now in its demoralized condition but upon what it might be expected to be 12 months from now. Now, what was the result? It was organized. A Mr. John Sparks, probably an estimable gentleman, I do not know him, was made president of this company, and I have letter after letter here, right here in my hands, from reputable men stating that the packers had gotten control of the company. You gentlemen can see these letters if you desire.

I am authorized by the signatories to print their names, but I do not wish to further imperil their financial stress by printing their names, because they are my friends. And the statement was also made, so one of these letters state, by a managing director "that we expect to make 35 per cent the first year." Off of whose money? Off of yours and mine. Off of the people's money. How could they make it? If they could not rediscount their paper through the War Finance Corporation, they could not exist three months and make any money. What business has Congress in this matter, you may ask. This is what Congress has to do concerning this matter: That the stock of this corporation was taken, so I am informed, by cattlemen, by ranchmen, by business men, who said they wanted to help the agricultural and live-stock producers throughout that country; and if it is making unreasonable dividends, gentlemen, upon the misfortunes of the live-stock industry on your money, Congress therefore ought to have a say in regard to it. Now, I want to say to you that this live-stock corporation to-day is expecting to and is rediscounting their paper through the War Finance Corporation under the Norris amendment organized for the relief of agriculture and live stock. That is the answer as to what Congress has to do with a proposition of that kind.

Now, the statement went out that the packers had gotten control. A friend of mine who edits one of the leading papers in the city of Fort Worth, and I believe a paper that has the largest circulation in Texas, and with whom I served, with pleasant remembrances, in the Texas Legislature, denied the statement and said that the packers had nothing to do with the corporation—although he may not want the fact told here that he once served in the legislature. But here is a statement in the Dallas News, and a similar one appearing in his own paper, the Star-Telegram, under a recent date line. I will let you draw your own conclusions:

Roy C. Vance was elected president of the Stockyards National Bank at the meeting of the board of directors Wednesday morning. He succeeds John N. Sparks, who recently resigned to take up the presidency of the Agricultural Live Stock Finance Corporation. Mr. Vance also will head the Fort Worth Cattle Loan Co., which is affiliated with the bank. The two institutions represent the Armour and Swift financial interests in Fort Worth and Texas.

Have the packers anything to do with this corporation? One of the men goes from a packer bank and takes charge of it, and another one from a packer bank takes his place. I have no fight to make upon the packers individually. I like Mr. Louis Swift and have had considerable correspondence with him as to matters of legislation. But the trouble with the packer is that every time his business is criticized he rushes into print in order to vindicate himself instead of discussing and solving the problem put up to him by and for the benefit of the people.

The packer says he only makes 90 cents a head on the cattle slaughtered. I think the packer takes himself too seriously as to the profits he is making and what the people think about them. I want to say to you, gentlemen, that if beef sold on the hoof and beef sold on the block at prices that were in proportion the people would not care so darn much what the packers' profits were. I want to ask you gentlemen and also the packers if a 4-cent beef steer and a 40-cent beefsteak has come to stay? I want to ask you also whether a 4-cent lamb and a 75-cent lamb chop are fixtures in this Government?

Now, getting back to this corporation.

Am I warranted in making these statements and bringing this matter to the attention of Congress? Let me read to you of the many, many letters I have received from good, level-headed, reputable citizens, who, if you knew them as I do, you would not question any statement they would make. Their integrity is 100 per cent and their Americanism 1,000 per cent, tested by the true standard during the World War, in which our country played such a conspicuous part. But before I read these letters let me make a further statement. The valuation placed by this corporation upon live stock, so another letter informs me, for loan purposes, is as follows:

	Per head.
Grown, well-graded cows	$25
Calves from these cows	10
Grown sheep	3
Good Angora goats	1

Now, how do these prices gibe with 21-cent wool and 25-cent mohair? A sheep that will shear $2 per year is worth $8 intrinsically, and any stockman knows it. A goat that will shear $1.50 worth of mohair is worth $4, and everybody, except certain loan companies, know it.

Now, I copy from the Cattleman, a publication of the Texas cattle raisers, at Fort Worth, sales made on October 18 of the Highland Hereford Association, comprising an organization of splendid cattlemen in west Texas, in my district, at Decatur, Ill. Some of these calves were sold to a citizen in the home town of my venerable friend, Uncle JOE CANNON:

The auction sale conducted by members of the Texas Highland Hereford Association of Marfa October 18, at the farm of J. G. Imboden & Son, near Decatur, Ill., was one of the outstanding features of the October cattle trade. Over 2,000 stockmen and farmers attended the sale. The 148 yearling steers sold for an average of $46.04; 25 yearling heifers, $36.75; 887 steer calves, $37.31; and 545 heifer calves, $31.95 per head.

The top price for calves was $45 and yearlings $50 per head. All were sold by the head and no weights taken.

A list of the breeders consigning cattle to the sale, number of head, class, names of purchasers, and the prices per head follows:

F. A. Mitchell, 48 steer calves to T. J. Rixon, Britton, Mich., at $45 per head.

F. A. Mitchell, 48 heifer calves to William Davidson, Gaston, Ill., at $35 per head.

T. H. Rawls, 16 heifers and 29 steers to L. D. Olliver, Mattoon, Ill., at $35 per head.

Smith Bros., 50 heifer calves to O. J. Austin, Pana, Ill., at $32 per head.

W. P. Fisher, 50 steer calves to C. W. Judy, Potomac, Ill., at $34.75 per head.

W. P. Fisher, 25 steer calves to A. J. Seyfert, Danville, Ill., at $32 per head.

W. P. Fisher, 50 heifer calves to Jacob Bilyen, Mowequa, Ill., at $30.50 per head.

W. P. Fisher, 50 steer calves to A. G. Seyfert, Danville, Ill., at $35 per head.

Now, how do these prices for calves and steer yearlings compare with your valuations of $25, or even $30 valuations, on grown cattle?

Now, I give you a few of the letters showing my authority and purpose for bringing this matter before Congress, which I feel it my duty and which numbers of my constituents have requested me to do:

SAN ANGELO, TEX., December 1, 1921.

Hon. C. B. HUDSPETH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CLAUDE: I see from to-day's Star-Telegram, Sparks is out just raring and ready to take care of the dear people.

I had a talk with ——— on yesterday; he had just returned from Fort Worth. He said he offered them 8,000 good, young sheep and 2,000 goats for $25,000; they turned it down because they owned land and owed debts, and that they turned ——— down on his loan of $100,000 on 4,000 good cattle because ——— didn't have any land.

He said that Sparks told him that $500,000 of that stock was taken in Fort Worth; that 90 per cent of that company was taken by men not cowmen; that they were going to have, after this war-finance money could not be used, a big cattle loan company at Fort Worth that could take care of the cowmen so they would not have to go north. He said that they were working for the stockholders and not the cowmen. They said they did not want any slow paper and didn't want to take over anybody that was in debt.

I thought the purpose of it was to help the poor devils that were in debt. A man that is not in debt can take care of himself pretty well. ——— said that thing was a disadvantage to the cowmen, that it was absolutely putting men at the mercy of the packers.

Very truly, yours,

——— ———.

PECOS, TEX., December 3, 1921.

Hon. C. B. HUDSPETH,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The inclosed clippings, one from the Star-Telegram, of Fort Worth, and the other from the El Paso Herald, El Paso, Tex., will explain themselves.

We want to tell you that we certainly appreciate what you are doing in our behalf, and if it was not for you, do not know what the poor cattleman would do. Several of our people went to Fort Worth with applications for loans from the Agricultural Live Stock Finance Corporation, and they placed such a low valuation on their cattle that they were unable to get the needed relief, but I understand they have been more lenient within the last few days, and that your efforts in the cattleman's behalf has been the cause of it. You, of course, know that a yearling or cow, or any other kind of live stock on the range, is worth considerably more there than it is in the stock yards. It seems that the sapheads who figure on the valuation do not take that fact into consideration.

Again thanking you, and with best wishes, I am,

Your friend,

——— ———.

SAN ANGELO, TEX., November 29, 1921.

Hon. C. B. HUDSPETH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CLAUDE: It occurs to me that an extravagant amount of agitation and talk that has come on in connection with the organization of the Fort Worth Loan Co., which, as you know, has been organized for the purpose of making live-stock loans and passing same on to the War Finance Corporation, has been a positive injury to this country instead of a benefit.

The people of this country believed that when organization of the Fort Worth Loan Association was completed they would be able to obtain loans along the line set out in Gov. Harding's speech made in San Angelo last spring, but it seems from the talk I gather on the streets and in the offices of my associates that this loan company is setting itself up strictly as a money-making institution, and is not considering the relief it might be to all of the Southwest if it would adopt a more liberal policy.

For instance, they are declining to consider a man's real estate or any other additional collateral. As a matter of fact many of the stock of this country were bought at a high time and are already mortgaged for more money than the Fort Worth Co. is willing to place on them. Take for instance the ranch owned by (———) myself, which is located at a railroad station, is improved to the extent of $3 to $4 per acre, and contains 7,300 acres. On it we run 500 pure-bred white-faced cattle, 1,200 to 2,000 sheep, and 200 to 500 goats. We believe that this property or plant is well worth $125,000, but if we went to the Forth Worth Co. for a loan, under their rulings we could only borrow something like $10,000 on our cattle, and could not get anything on the balance of the security. You can see that, were we disposed to do so, we could not borrow sufficient money on this property to help anybody. While we are not applicants for a loan, yet the condition might arrive where, if we could borrow 40 or 50 per cent of the value of our ranch and stock, we might help tide some other friends over their difficult situations.

I am told that ——— went down to secure a loan of $100,000 on about 4,000 head of cattle and was turned down flat. Two years ago you and I thought that ——— was a very well-fixed man, and on that day he was. But now, if he has to continue paying his leases and 10 per cent interest, he can not remain in business long. On the other hand, if he could get the benefit of the reduced interest rate that the War Finance Corporation is trying to extend, his savings in interest would be enough to meet the balance of his expenses and enable him to tide over.

I am also told that ——— and ——— made an application for a loan on 11,000 head of good sheep and were told that sheep loans were not wanted. Now, you know that when careful business men like ——— and ——— have 11,000 head of unincumbered, nice young Rambouillet sheep and can not borrow $3, $4, or $5 per head on them, that business is getting in a very peculiar situation.

I have one friend who has a 6,000-acre ranch, very highly improved, very fine black land in a live-stock country, that is actually worth $20 per acre. He has about 400 head of registered cattle that should be easily worth $100 per head, and something like 2,000 head of sheep and goats that are easily worth $8,000 or $10,000. In addition to this he has notes amounting to some $20,000 and different kinds of stock in companies worth $25,000 or $30,000, and he unfortunately finds himself about $100,000 in debt at the present time. You can easily see that if he has to stay up against this 10 per cent interest proposition, that it is sure to get him in a short while. On the other hand, if he could have this money at 6 or 8 per cent, the savings in interest would run his outfit and be the means of saving a good man and not have him closed out and put a much worse man on the job.

Summing the whole situation up, it does seem strange that for the vast amount of wealth there is in the United States that producing businesses should be put in such a condition where people who had 50 to 75 per cent equity in their business find themselves absolutely unable to expense themselves and are facing bankruptcy. You know that this land can never be worth less intrinsically than it is to-day. It might sell cheaper on account of oppressed conditions, but it always comes back, and you know the old saying that they are not producing any more land, but we are producing people, and if we want to have a stable country people must own homes and live on them. If these conditions continue as they are, I see nothing for our country but a state of chaos such as we read of in Russia.

Hope you will pardon this long letter, but I know that you are deeply interested in the affairs of this country, and it would make you sick to be here and witness the state of mind in which our people are in.

With sincere good wishes, I remain,

Your friend,

——— ———.

P. S.—You understand that I am writing this from a disinterested viewpoint. Of course, I have a good solvent business, ———, out of debt, that is paying me sufficient salary to live on.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I would like to have two minutes more in order to attempt to halfway discuss this great problem which so seriously affects my people.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Let me say this, gentlemen, in conclusion: You ask what the remedy is; what Congress can do. Now, if they have organized a corporation at Fort Worth, Tex., concerning which statements are made, as these numerous letters to me disclose, that they expect to make 35 per cent the first year, that they are not organizing for the protection of the live-stock producer but are after this money of the Government. That they are organized solely for the benefit of the stockholders, that they take no loans where the man is in debt, that they intend to keep up a big loan company after the Government has withdrawn its support. There are, in all probability, similar corporations organized in your States. Do you want them to make unreasonable dividends on your money?

And if that is the object of these corporations, ostensibly organized to relieve the live-stock situation, if they are making big dividends on the misfortunes of the live-stock producer, then the Government ought to withdraw this money. I am simply giving you this as it is given to me by letter. It ought not to discount the paper of a corporation that is in the business for the evil purpose of making big dividends for themselves, as these letters state to me is being done. A corporation is organized there that says it does not propose to make loans to people in debt, or loans that are slow. These are the ones that need it, and one of the first loans, so I am informed, was to a party in south Texas of $500,000, a man that could go to the Hanover National Bank any day in the year and get the money. Another, so these letters inform me, of $400,000, to a man in Fort Worth, recently reputed to me to be worth millions, who ought to get this money on his own naked indorsement from any bank in the country having that amount. I want it distinctly understood I am not making any wholesale indictment of the directorate of this corporation. Many of the directors are personal friends of mine, are good men, and I know would do no man an injustice, but, on the other hand, would use their best endeavor to relieve the people who need it and must have it. Furthermore, I know that this corporation could not in safety make loans that the War Finance Corporation would and could not rediscount. The War Finance Corporation, however, expressed themselves to me to desire to be extremely liberal, considering at all times the limitations of the law under which they operate.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDSPETH. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Suppose the Government does withdraw this money. What will become of the stock raiser?

Mr. HUDSPETH. Well, they are not getting very much relief under this proposition, so these letters from reputable people state to me.

Mr. WALSH. No benefit whatever?

Mr. HUDSPETH. Oh, some benefit, probably, to a few, but not the relief it was expected would be given at the incipiency. That is what these letters state. One of these letters states that "it is a detriment instead of a benefit," and it comes from a good man who does not want to borrow a dollar from it—that is, this loan company—not the War Finance Corporation. I want to state that the gentlemen down there composing the War Finance Corporation have done their best to relieve that situation. You say, What is the remedy? What can Congress do? I will answer you right off the reel. Report out of the Banking and Currency Committee at once the bill which I hold in my hand, introduced by my friend, Congressman STRONG, of Kansas, and which is heartily indorsed by Gov. Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board; which provides for loans on two years' time to agriculture and live stock at 6 per cent and 6½ per cent interest by Federal reserve banks, these loans to be made direct to the producer; then you will solve the problem and save the second greatest industry in the world from the rocks of bankruptcy. I tell you, my friends, something must be done and done immediately. They can not wait. The financial wolf is howling; howling around the doors of their humble ranch homes day and night. They did not bring it about. Our Government in time of stress brought it about. If these loan companies organized for relief—and I want to say emphatically that I do not favor the making of a loan where there is a great element of risk; I do not favor dissipating the stockholders' money, but the moral risk and the time should be given weighty consideration—convert themselves into cold-blooded money-making machines and make loans only to the rich, who can step into any bank and borrow to their heart's desire, then I say, sirs, I am not in favor of the Government further lending its aid to these schemes of high financing if these hundred letters correctly inform me—and I believe the writers and know most of them personally.

Let me say to you Congressmen from the North and East, who are largely consumers, the live-stock producer for the past two years—and 18 months, especially—has been forced to throw his shear stuff and his calves and lambs on the market in order to keep his eyebrows out of the financial slough. At least 300,000 calves and 500,000 lambs went to market from Texas last year. You know what is going to happen. You are going to awake some fine morning to find the greatest shortage of meat and wool that this country has ever known, and then when these commodities are shipped in from the Argentine and abroad you will pay for them dearly. Now, what are you going to do about it? These men are calling for the "life line" from this Congress, and it must be thrown now. Not in 60 days or 6 months, but now, or they perish. The mothers in their sunbonnets, God bless them, knitted; the fathers borrowed money at 10 per cent and bought Liberty bonds, and borrowed money and increased their flocks. Their sons helped "hold the line" on the Argonne and at Chateau-Thierry for civilization. Gentlemen of Congress, will you help hold the line for them now? [Applause.]

I herewith attach, Mr. Chairman, the bill by Congressman STRONG of Kansas as a part of my remarks on this subject:

A bill (H. R. 8906) to amend the Federal reserve act so as to enlarge the open-market powers of Federal reserve banks by permitting them to purchase and sell long-time paper secured by shipping documents or warehouse receipts covering staple agricultural products or by chattel mortgages on live stock.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 14 of the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the acts approved September 7, 1916, June 21, 1917, and April 13, 1920, be further amended by adding at the end of the section a new paragraph reading as follows:

Any Federal reserve bank may, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board, purchase, at a rate of discount not less than 1 per cent per annum above the rate prevailing at said Federal reserve bank for eligible short-time commercial paper maturing within 90 days, and sell in the United States from or to any bank, individual, partnership, association, or corporation notes, drafts, and bills of exchange which (1) have maturities not in excess of one year and are secured by warehouse receipts conveying or securing title covering nonperishable staple agricultural products stored in warehouses independent of the borrower, or (2) have maturities not in excess of one year and are secured by shipping documents or chattel mortgages conveying or securing title covering nonperishable agricultural products, or (3) have maturities not in excess of two years and are secured by chattel mortgages on unencumbered live stock, and each of which bears the unrestricted signature or indorsement of a bank or the unrestricted signatures or indorsements of not less than three parties, each of whom has filed with the Federal reserve bank a financial statement satisfactory to said Federal reserve bank showing his net worth to be not less than twice the face amount of said note, draft, or bill of exchange: Provided, however, That the aggregate amount of unmatured or outstanding notes, drafts, or bills of exchange purchased by any Federal reserve bank under authority of this paragraph from any one bank or corporation, including any such notes, drafts, or bills of exchange purchased from such bank or corporation and rediscounted with other Federal reserve banks plus the amount of such notes, drafts, and bills of exchange purchased by other Federal reserve banks from such bank or corporation and rediscounted by such Federal reserve bank, shall not exceed the paid-up capital stock and surplus of such bank or corporation. The Federal Reserve Board shall have power to permit, or, on the affirmative vote of at least five of its members, to require Federal reserve banks to rediscount, at rates of interest to be fixed by said board, notes, drafts, and bills of exchange purchased by other Federal reserve banks under authority of this paragraph; but no Federal reserve bank shall hold at any one time an aggregate amount of notes, drafts, and bills of exchange originally purchased or rediscounted under authority of this paragraph in excess of 50 per cent of its surplus fund; and the aggregate amount of notes, drafts, and bills of exchange originally purchased by any one Federal reserve bank under authority of this paragraph and still outstanding, including notes, drafts, and bills of exchange rediscounted with other Federal reserve banks, shall not exceed the total amount of its surplus fund. Notes, drafts, or bills of exchange purchased or rediscounted under authority of this paragraph shall not be eligible as collateral security for Federal reserve notes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I wish to vary the program somewhat by commending that portion of the President's address to Congress to-day which reads as follows:

The previous Congress, deeply concerned in behalf of our merchant marine, in 1920 enacted the existing shipping law, designed for the upbuilding of the American merchant marine. Among other things provided to encourage our shipping on the world's seas, the Executive was directed to give notice of the termination of all existing commercial treaties in order to admit of reduced duties on imports carried in American bottoms. During the life of the act no Executive has complied with this order of the Congress. When the present administration came into responsibility it began an early inquiry into the failure to execute the expressed purpose of the Jones Act. Only one conclusion has been possible. Frankly, Members of House and Senate, eager as I am to join you in the making of an American merchant marine commensurate with our commerce, the denouncement of our commercial treaties would involve us in a chaos of trade relationships and add indescribably to the confusion of the already disordered commercial world. Our power to do so is not disputed, but power and ships, without comity of relationship, will not give us the expanded trade which is inseparably linked with a great merchant marine. Moreover, the applied reduction of duty, for which the treaty denouncements were necessary, encouraged only the carrying of dutiable imports to our shores, while the tonnage which unfurls the flag on the seas is both free and dutiable, and the cargoes which make a nation eminent in trade are outgoing rather than incoming.

The President referred to section 34 of the merchant marine act of June 5, 1920. At the time of the consideration of that bill in the House I spoke and voted against it because of this and other provisions which I deemed unwise and indefensible, and consequently I am gratified, as I indicated, that President Harding has subscribed to the same view that I then expressed.

Moreover, I wish to call attention to the further fact that after this law was enacted President Wilson, in like manner as President Harding has done, declined to undertake to carry out the directions contained in said section 34 of the merchant marine act. A similar question was presented in 1879 to President Hayes, in that Congress passed a law directing the President to give notice of the abrogation of two articles of a treaty then existing with China. President Hayes, because of such direction, vetoed that bill, and in doing so very properly and correctly stated, among other things—

The power of making new treaties or of modifying existing treaties is not lodged by the Constitution in Congress, but with the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as shown by the concurrence of two-thirds of that body.

President Wilson very naturally knew that to be true; he knew that this was an attempted invasion of the functions and powers of the Executive, and could be nothing more than an expression of will and desire on the part of Congress. Yet, as a matter of fact, he did the same thing that President Harding says he did—that is, he took the matter up with a view of complying with the wishes of Congress if possible and feasible. However, he soon saw that an effort of that kind would be fraught with many serious difficulties and obstacles, and so he declined to undertake to carry out those provisions.

But what was the result? In keeping with the deliberately systematic plan and scheme of vituperation and abuse of President Wilson then being recklessly indulged, certain interests and even Members of the Congress viciously criticized President Wilson, even going so far as to declare that he ought to be impeached; and one Member of this House stated on the floor that he intended to move for President Wilson's impeachment because of his declination to carry out these provisions.

Now, in defense of the very proper and courageous action of President Wilson, and of the equally proper and courageous action on the part of President Harding, in declining to carry out that direction of Congress, I wish to call attention to certain facts which no doubt moved both of those Executives in reaching the conclusion they did. This provision involves the denouncement of 25 treaties with as many different nations, including all of the great nations—treaties that have been in existence all the way from a few years to 116 years—and they were treaties which did not provide for the separate abrogation of these particular provisions against which this act was directed. The only recourse would be to denounce the entire treaty. That could not be done in many instances without an absolute violation of treaties, because some of those treaties continued for certain definite periods of time, without the power of abrogation. And, furthermore, each and every one of those treaties contained other provisions, some of them numerous, other important provisions dealing with various subjects, granting reciprocal rights to the two contracting parties. Some of those provisions granted us favors and benefits in consideration of favors and benefits granted the other nation; and, in fact, with regard to the particular provisions mentioned in section 34 of the merchant marine act the provisions were entirely mutual and reciprocal. They granted to us the same rights that they granted to the other countries, and imposed upon us the same obligations that were imposed upon the other countries.

The so-called commercial treaties between this Government and other nations contain provisions securing for the citizens or subjects of each of the contracting parties reciprocal equality in the matter of duties imposed on the cargoes of vessels of each country in the ports of the other. The following article in the treaty concluded with the Argentine Republic on July 27, 1853, is a fair example of the provisions against which said section 34 of the merchant marine act was apparently directed:

> The same duties shall be paid and the same drawbacks and bounties allowed upon the importation or exportation of an article into or from the territories of the United States or into or from the territories of the Argentine Confederation, whether such importation or exportation be made in vessels of the United States or in vessels of the Argentine Confederation.

This incident presents additional evidence of the wisdom of our forefathers in establishing three separate coordinate branches of the Government, and of the lack of wisdom on the part of Congress when it undertakes to invade the province of the Chief Executive, which is the only treaty-making power; just as a lack of wisdom is always shown when the Chief Executive undertakes to encroach upon the authority of the Congress.

I could dwell at length upon various important provisions in numerous existing treaties which would have to be denounced along with the particular provisions mentioned in section 34, if either President Wilson or President Harding had undertaken to carry out those instructions.

Suffice it to state, as President Harding indicated and as was still truer 18 months ago, that this is no time to make confusion still worse confounded in world affairs and still further straining our relations with foreign countries by undertaking to denounce our treaties with 25 nations of the earth with which we are at peace, thereby arousing their suspicion, if not their ill will, and then to undergo the slow, tedious, doubtful, dangerous process of agreeing upon new treaties with all these countries.

I want again to call attention to the fact that President Wilson has been completely vindicated upon this proposition by the Republican President, and, as I before stated, after a Republican Member of this House went so far as to declare that he was going to move the impeachment of President Wilson for the very thing that President Harding has since very properly done.

However, this is only one of many vindications of President Wilson that have already occurred, and of many, many more that will occur in the future. The fact of the business is that, regardless of their preelection charges, criticisms, and promises, whenever the present administration honestly gets the true facts that prompted the preceding administration, this administration nearly always pursues the same course, and whenever it undertakes to pursue a different course it invariably "meets itself coming back." [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 10 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HICKS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the state of the Union and had come to no resolution thereon.

PRINTING COPIES OF THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed as many copies of the President's address as can be printed for $500, for distribution to Members through the folding room as a House document.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Wednesday, December 7, 1921, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 7, 1921.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, truly this is one of Thy days and we would rejoice therein. We bless Thee for all the providences which enrich our daily lives. And this morning where shadows have gathered and where under the habiliments of mourning there are aching hearts, we bear before Thee the honored home stricken in the South and humbly ask Thee to comfort as one whom his mother comforts. Bless us each along the pathway and help us always to recognize the hand that leads. We ask in Jesus Christ's name. Amen.

The VICE PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

KEY PITTMAN, a Senator from the State of Nevada, and THOMAS STERLING, a Senator from the State of South Dakota, appeared in their seats to-day.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

SUPPLEMENTAL ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATION, 1922 (S. DOC. NO. 92).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a letter from the Director of the Bureau of the Budget submitting supplemental estimates of appropriation required for the service of the fiscal year 1922 in the total sum of $815,475—for the War Department, $132,500; for the Interior Department, $82,975; and for the Department of Agriculture, $600,000—which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

EXPENSES, UNITED STATES COURT OF CUSTOMS APPEALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Acting Attorney General, transmitting, pursuant to law, a statement of expenditures under appropriations for the United States Court of Customs Appeals for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INCREASED COMPENSATION, DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Acting Attorney General, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report showing the average number of employees of the Department of Justice, including the courts of the United States, receiving increased compensation at the rate of $240 per annum; also the average number of grades receiving the same at each other rate, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PROCEEDS FROM SALES, ALASKAN ENGINEERING COMMISSION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report showing proceeds from the sale of surplus and obsolete material and equipment, and from collections from town-site assessments during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921, in connection with the construction and operation of railroads in the Territory of Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions.

REPORTS OF THE SECRETARY OF THE SENATE.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate two communications from the Secretary of the Senate, transmitted, pursuant to law, which, with the accompanying papers, were ordered to lie on the table and, on motion of Mr. SMOOT, to be printed, as follows:

An account of all property, including stationery, belonging to the United States in the possession of the Secretary of the Senate on December 5, 1921 (S. Doc. No. 91); and

A statement of receipts and expenditures of the Senate for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921 (S. Doc. No. 95).

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS REPORTS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual reports of the Librarian of Congress and the Superintendent of the Library Building and Grounds for the fiscal year ended

June 30, 1921, which were referred to the Committee on the Library.

REPORT OF THE GOVERNOR OF THE PANAMA CANAL.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and ordered to be printed and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, the annual report of the governor of the Panama Canal for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 7, 1921.

REPORTS OF UNITED STATES BUREAU OF EFFICIENCY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

To the Congress of the United States:

As required by the acts of March 4, 1915, and February 28, 1916, I transmit herewith the reports of the United States Bureau of Efficiency for the years ended October 31, 1919, 1920, and 1921.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 7, 1921.

REPORT OF THE GOVERNOR OF PORTO RICO (S. DOC. NO. 93).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions, and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

As required by section 12 of the act of Congress approved March 12, 1917, entitled "An act to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," I transmit herewith, for the information of Congress, the report of the Governor of Porto Rico for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921.

This report will not be printed as a part of the annual report of the War Department as heretofore.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 7, 1921.

[NOTE.—Report accompanied similar message to the House of Representatives.]

REPORT OF NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE FOR AERONAUTICS (S. DOC. NO. 94).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read and ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

In compliance with the provisions of the act of March 3, 1915, establishing the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, I transmit herewith the seventh annual report of the committee for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921.

I think there can be no doubt that the development of aviation will become of great importance for the purposes of commerce, as well as for national defense. While the material progress in aircraft has been remarkable, the use has not as yet been extensively developed in America. This has been due, in the main, to lack of wise and necessary legislation. Aviation is destined to make great strides, and I believe that America, its birthplace, can and should be foremost in its development.

I therefore urge upon the Congress the advisability of giving heed to the recommendations of the committee, the first and most important of which is that a bureau be established in the Department of Commerce for the regulation and development of air navigation.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 7, 1921.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SPENCER presented 75 petitions of 2,104 citizens of the State of Missouri, praying for the recognition of the Irish republic by the Government of the United States, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented two memorials of sundry citizens of Clinton, Owensville, Rosebud, Canaan, and Bland, all in the State of Missouri, remonstrating against the enactment of Senate bill 1948, providing for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

AMENDMENT TO THE TARIFF BILL.

Mr. McNARY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 7456, the permanent tariff bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL CLERK OF COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. WADSWORTH submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 184), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ an additional clerk at the rate of $1,600 per annum, to be paid out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, during the second session of the Sixty-seventh Congress.

LAW ENFORCEMENT.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I have here a copy of the address on law enforcement delivered by Hon. Guy D. Goff, Assistant to the Attorney General, before the National Law Enforcement Convention, in this city last evening. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

(By Hon. Guy D. Goff, assistant to the Attorney General. Delivered before the National Law Enforcement Convention, held in Washington, D. C., Dec. 6, 1921.)

Moments of supreme satisfaction come to every man. Such were mine when your chairman invited me to address this great gathering upon the question of law enforcement. He who discharges this duty enjoys a privilege and incurs a responsibility. It should be the wish of the speaker so to express himself that some of his words will remain in your memory long after this occasion is over. I shall speak to you, rather than before you, to you directly, to the end that we may reason together.

We are guided and governed by the eternal laws of justice to which we are subject. We may bite our chains as we will, but we shall be made to know ourselves and be taught that man is born to be governed by law, and he that will substitute will in the place of it is an enemy of God. No man in this country is so high that he is above the law, even though he may regard the rule or regulation as a personal affront. No officer of the law may set that law at defiance. All the officers of this Government, from the highest to the lowest, are but the creatures of the law and are bound to obey it. Government is a trust, and the officers of the Government are trustees, and both the trust and the trustees are created by the people for the benefit of all the people.

There is no greater evil to-day than the nonenforcement by public officials of laws which they have sworn to uphold. It is not for an executive, State or Federal, to say whether a law is good or bad. He should enforce it, or confess failure and resign. Therefore, behind every public office stands a power which creates it, and to which it is responsible. That power under our form of government is the sovereign will of the people. No government can be maintained without a principle of fear as well as of duty. Good men will obey the latter, bad men will obey only the former. The underlying evil in the administration of our public affairs is simply dishonesty. Our public offices are too often held by dishonest men, and too often used for dishonest ends. The error is rooted in a mistaken and immoral theory as to the nature of the position they hold. In law and morals a public office is but an agency of the people. They fix its duties and supply its salary. Few deny this truth, but practically it is contradicted every day in all parts of the Union. To have good government we must have good citizens, and always, continuously, a warfare without truce or quarter against those who violate the law. It is strange but true that bad men are combined and good citizens are divided, and that therein lies the cause of lawbreaking. If the good would join hands, the lawless could do nothing, because they constitute but a small proportion of the entire population. Burke's well-known words can not be too often quoted: "There never was long a corrupt government of a virtuous people." When we find any self-governing people afflicted with misgovernment, we can safely believe that they do not deserve a better fate.

Obedience to law is not confined to any form of government, to any race, or to any period in the world's history. If the laws are ignored, there is no government at all. Disregard for one law breeds contempt for all laws. This leads to corruption, and ultimately to destruction of all order. Respect for the law belongs to men of character, who are not only the conscience of government, but in every well-governed State its best motive power. It is the moral qualities in man and State that rule the world. The strength, the industry, and the civilization of a people all depend on individual character, and the very foundations of civil security rest upon it. Laws and institutions are but its outgrowth.

The first century of the English occupation of this continent, being the second century after the discovery of the New World, was the period in which the citizenship of our Republic was created. Whether he came to New England or Virginia, the Briton brought all the rights of personal manhood that had been written with strong hands and stout hearts into the very text of the Magna Charta. But while he brought the rights of the commoner, he did not bring the burdens of an inherited and traditional aristocracy. From the very beginning, all that was freest and best in English custom and English law had here a full course and a fair field, and thus was laid the first, the deepest, and the surest foundations of a free State and a full free citizenship of the free man. Two theories of government largely responsible for the spiritual and the intellectual outlook of our people were, however, then interwoven in the growing Colonies. These were the forces of State and Federal authority—the centrifugal and the centripetal forces of government. Men had been trained in those days to love the colony, and by inheritance to love the State. The sense of local freedom and the jealousies of central authority alike combined to make the citizens of the State distrustful of a new and unlimited National Government. On the other hand, men saw and felt that in union alone was strength, and that no Government could endure without the power to enforce its own decrees and compel obedience to its rightful commands. Between these theories there had to be compromise, or there could be no agreement. The Federal Constitution was such a compromise, and out of it grew the largest and the best scheme of popular free government that the world has yet seen tried. And so our fathers began with complete recognition of the absolute and inalienable rights of man as man. On this solid foundation they built their fabric of government. In time there came the spiritual conception of State and Nation. Those who loved the Union most insisted that to the Nation their highest allegiance belonged, and that when the State and Nation came in conflict, the Nation was supreme. The fact of Negro slavery intensified this difference. The debates went on in Congress, in court, in pulpit, and at last ended upon the field of battle. When the struggle of arms was ended, the debate was ended. Brave and honorable men had submitted this question of human government to the last tribunal known on earth, and when that tribunal had rendered its decree, that this Union of States, born of the people of the United States, is, and shall be forever, a Nation of laws with all that nationality implies, that decision was, and shall forever be, binding upon us all.

Thus has come, unmatched and unequaled, with all its name implies, the United States of America, and the question arises, must arise in every mind: To what shall it eventually grow to be? Rest is impossible. In all this vast creation, in plant, in earth, in stone there is no rest, and so there is and can be no rest in man, in social system or in State. We grow to better or we lapse to worse. The manhood of this people just in so far as it obeys the law will grow more manly, and in so far as it rejects the law will sink backward through sickening changes of weakness, vice, and degradation to anarchy, to an unmanly loss of liberty, and to an unmanly submission to slavery, first of the mob and then of the despot. Absolute liberty to do as one wishes would mean barbarism, for there would be no limit to the conduct of an individual except his whims. The liberty of one would be the unrestricted liberty of every other, and anarchy and absence of law would result as the wants and desires of men came into conflict.

And so I emphasize this fact, that we must learn to see in this great Republic of ours the powers of personality, morality, and spirituality struggling for utterance against the greed for gold, power, and falsehood—dangers as real as they are insidious. The clash of policies and the clash of moral forces are but the outer evidence of the deeper and more fateful clash of intellects. The lights that flash upon our vision, and the shadows that fall across our way, are only the faint, far-off reflections of the joys and the tragedies that move the lives of our friends and our neighbors.

And all through this vital, throbbing people the pulse of one great purpose beats and swells—a purpose that reveals its meaning more and more to those who reflect and will understand that personality and character and respect for the law are alone eternal, and that the real issues of the struggle are not intellectual or material but spiritual and moral, and that character is the constant factor in our governmental stability. The social conscience about which we hear so much is not a mere generalization nor a vague ghost stalking through our civilization and haunting our dreams, but it is a great national ledger in which all our mistakes, hopes, and aspirations are registered and which time reveals to us all.

This is a new era—"The old order changeth, yielding place to the new, and God fulfills Himself in many ways." In view of the present discontent and violation of the law, I was asked recently if this were not the hour when we should listen to sermons and be thankful. I replied, no—that it was the hour when we should take stock and find ourselves. We are reaping the harvest of the great disorder that always accompanies and succeeds war. Our situation does not differ in the least from that existing elsewhere. We are not the only people with problems of incompetence, graft, and criminal aggression. We have been tried and searched by grim tests, and we are now struggling back to everyday conditions. The world is distrustful and too many of our law-abiding people hesitate and delay to do the very things necessary to a speedy recovery. Individual men and women have knowingly sought substitutes for their old maxims, and have weakly proclaimed new discoveries in the make-up of society. The present-day idealist judges without psychology and purposely excludes himself. He shuts men off in water-tight compartments only to create a false sense of superiority. He labels one good, the other bad. Christ tried to teach men not to do that. It is such attitudes that make our habitual efforts at reform so dangerous. Men are not good or bad. They are good and bad. Self-righteousness is a real American peril, but no one possesses a monopoly of those virtues which go to make up real manhood and womanhood, and everyone knows that some men and women are crafty, dishonest, and responsive to immorality and criminal influences. We all know that life has been trying to teach humanity this fundamental lesson from the days of the first man and the first woman.

War lifted the nations engaged into a great force of unlimited energy. It lit the imagination, and the result was collective enthusiasm, much of which was at the expense of character and those principles which we have been taught to hold dear. Economic and ethical values became unsettled and too many of us were responsive to the unrest so prevalent on every side. The searching of our souls disclosed much that was good and much that was bad; but peril abides in this practice if it be too generally followed. Too many of us have a vivid taste for such tasks. The man who searches other people's souls will have no time to search his own. We must not preach disdain, because it exalts the menace of discontent. We must not take our mistakes too seriously, because that discourages repentance and destroys our sense of humor. Life has its absurd side, and those of us who are not snobs know that there is something in all of us at which we must laugh, and at which we do laugh, and at which the world always laughs. The situation admitted of corruption and invited and encouraged the ruthless pursuit of personal advantage. The manifold emergencies of the war and its complete preoccupation offered a perfect opportunity for the return of that unlovely trait in human nature that ever seeks gain out of the misfortunes and the afflictions which are the common lot. In every vocation and avocation, trade, and craft certain men felt the instinct and were vile enough to take advantage of their friends and crush their competitors. As was to be expected, the large majority refused to yield, but many, too many, surrendered. The profiteer stalked abroad in the land and inflation became the order of the day. The mass opinion and morality became infected with the selfish psychology of the few. Mankind went alooting, and whenever law stood in the way it was annihilated. The favorite excuse was that the restriction of production justified a higher profit and that the increased cost of living justified excessive wages. Those who did not profiteer were ground between the millstones, but the majority did not. Of such, thank God, is the Republic of America. However, it must be admitted that the great majority of people do not regard the welfare of the whole as the chief object of their social obligations, but rather the immediate attainment of their own selfish ends. During the war "emergency" was the great word to which the honest rose and which they made the "slogan" of a splendid Americanism. "Emergency" was the word with which the crooked palliated their dishonesty of getting away with "easy money," while those who played straight were engaged in winning the battles that saved civilization.

There will be no better days, no way out, no escape from these forces more miserably destructive than the forces of war, unless we determine to wash out the small things of life and put in their places a superb sincerity and fearlessness of censure. There is no panacea, just the imperative duty to face the situation in the light of the actual facts. There must be a candid and fearless judgment, unpleasant though it may be. There must be no hesitation in pronouncing that a large part of our people have not been honest. We must take stock in our minds as individuals, and in every nook and cranny of our social, political, and governmental existence. We must legislate and prosecute and drastically punish, but principally we must educate and practice what we preach. No one can deny that things are wrong and that men in their pursuit of false gods have forgotten honor and justice. It is education that is needed. We can not save humanity by hanging murderers and sending thieves to prison. We can save it only by teaching mankind not to murder and that theft is, of all roads to wealth, the most precarious. To-day all mankind is suspicious, doing nothing, playing safe.

America must not and will not yield to this condition. Instead she must be the positive nation. She will. And she will, I am sure, be positively good. A negative nation seeking constantly for evil, even though it seeks that it may punish, if it is not ready to supplant with the positive good, can not and will not triumph in the end. We must inculcate into our people the homely virtues on which civilization rests. We must teach and learn that a virtuous people possessed of aggressive honesty and patient endeavor needs few laws, and that law forced from without can never take the place of character. M. Guizot was once asked to define civilization. He replied: "It is the progress of society and the progress of the individual." But society can not progress without respect for authority and order which is its cornerstone, and the individual can not make progress without that protection and security which respect for the law insures. Strong as this Government is, it is not strong enough to last unless the American citizen is taught, if needs be made, to respect authority and revere the law; that is, civilization rests upon the law, and law upon civilization; and when this fact is appreciated and observed then no man will be above the law and the law will reign over all.

In the great field of the enforcement of the law our difficulties are incredible. The criminal classes are not only insolently bold, but our hitherto law-abiding citizens find it convenient to forget the law. This is true particularly of the prohibition law and its enforcement. But it is the will of the majority operating through Congress. The difficulties encountered in the enforcement of this law are due possibly to the fact that it was passed before public opinion in many localities was ready to support it. All history shows that any new law which interferes with the so-called personal liberty of the community must pass through the stages of open violation, secret violation, passive enforcement, and then universal observance throughout the land. Prohibition is not the only law which is difficult to enforce, for, as everyone knows, we are to-day in a period of disrespect for law and order. This is to be expected as the reaction from the great sacrifices during the World War. History records that for every such action there is a reaction; that every great sacrifice is followed by great selfishness; that extreme altruistic optimism is followed by pessimism; that prosperity is the mere forerunner of depression; and that immorality and crime are in the ebb of every great moral wave. It may perhaps serve a good purpose to trace these cycles and see what bearing they have upon the conditions which confront us. In the height of prosperity during the early part of the war we were extremely optimistic. Prices were inflated and profits were gigantic. We could not stand prosperity, and the temptation to make great profits made us extravagant, indolent, wasteful, and indifferent to law and order. Not only did the Government join in the mad rush to waste its funds but all classes forgot to save and disregarded the teachings of economy. We should have known, in fact we did know, that we could not and can not be selfish, dishonest, and wasteful without suffering the penalty. We should have known, and we did know, that a nation can not disrupt its commerce and take men out of productive employments without disturbing its general welfare. Then came a period of inefficiency, dishonesty, crafty business, and social immorality. But the revelations and investigations of to-day must be accepted with care. We must not by forgetting war conditions lose our perspective. The Government's losses were due to the cancellation of contracts running into the millions. The fruits of these obligations would have been essential to the public welfare if the war had continued, and most of them were prompted by the highest motives of honesty and patriotism. They must be settled and the losses adjusted. There must be compensation for materials purchased and not used, and adequate payment provided for services arranged for and not used.

None of this is the fault of a single American. It is the fault of those who plunged the world into war. And yet the inevitable result was the open violation of the laws of society and of the moral teachings of church and home. Large and violent robberies were attempted, the mails were obstructed, and disrespect for law and authority assumed terrifying proportions. Some officials—I regret to state it—shut their eyes to the fact that a law without execution is like a promise unperformed. Such conditions produce and did produce an almost endless chain of destructive and degrading practices. Gentlemen considered it honorable to carry flasks of liquor and boasted openly of violating the law; and ladies, seemingly disregardful of the fact that one violation leads to another, willfully converted their handbags into receptacles where the cocktail lurked and the highball reposed, in open and flagrant, if not fragrant, violation of the law. Another prevalent cause of disrespect for the law is predicated on a more or less widespread feeling that influence or able representation can thwart the purposes of the law and save those who by willfully violating it have assassinated the will of the people. All of these acts, each in themselves an infraction—and they are not confined to any one class of society—weakened the whole structure of this Government and sowed the seeds that furnish a harvest of crimes in the courts of the land, as a study of their records discloses. If we are to take stock, there must be no false idealism or hesitation in pronouncing that many of our people have not been honest. It may be a truism, but it is nevertheless true, that the call was never greater than now for the highest type of fearless moral manhood and womanhood to assert its force and reincarnate its power, and the remedy is simple, plain, and imperative if we hope to survive as a great people.

One word—honesty—tells what is needed. It tells us, too, that it is quite as important that we know and reaffirm that it is a word with no double meaning. There is no comparative degree. There is no alternative, save its opposite. Men and women are honest or they are not, and so with a people. The call of the law is for sane citizenship, a condition of mind that inquires first and believes afterwards, for not only a more active participation of every citizen in public affairs, but for a more tolerant view and attitude toward those with whom we differ.

A gifted jurist, and a great American, has said:

"The perpetuity of this Government depends upon the manner in which our laws are carried out. Nearly every State has laws to which no attention is paid, and they reap the fruits by having all laws broken. I am not an alarmist when I say if these conditions be tolerated the Republic itself will sooner or later fall by the props of the law on which it rests being weakened and destroyed. Americans are accustomed to regard a republican form of government as a natural condition. That such a government is mortal and can die is a thought so entirely foreign to our conditions that it is folly in the minds of some to discuss it. A glance at history does not lend encouragement to this cheerful view. Our Republic, though the best, is not the first nor the oldest. We have lasted now 138 years. Venice had a republican form of government for 1,100 years; Carthage, 700 years; Athens, with various intermissions, 900 years; Florence, 300 years; and Rome, 500 years. These Governments have long since passed from the stage of the world, and some of them are little remembered.

"If our Government were to last three centuries longer and then die, it would go down in history as one of the most splendid and shortest-lived among the wrecks with which the shores of time are strewn. What caused the downfall of these governments by the people? The people made laws until the laws became so many the people began to disregard their own laws. The laws of Rome were good. Indeed, the Justinian Code is said to be the most perfect system of laws ever devised by man. Yet Rome rotted and fell, even while the code was in operation. The laws were all right, but the hearts of the people were not right and the laws were not obeyed. When the laws ceased to reign, the Government resting upon the foundation of laws commenced to topple over. The reign of laws means the rule of the people, for a majority of the people make the laws. They register their will crystallized in the form of statutes. We need a revival of the rule of the people."

In this connection I also wish to cull and quote certain thoughts of my friend and chief, the Attorney General of the United States, in that most wonderful of orations delivered at the meeting of the American Bar Association at Cincinnati, August 31, 1921. He said:

"The history of civilization has been a continuous struggle for law and order."

"Respect for law is the one essential fact of our civilization. Without it life, liberty, and property are insecure. Without it civilization falls back to the chaos and anarchy of primitive times.

"Our safety and happiness lies in obedience to law by every man, woman, and child within the domain of our Republic, and no one can undermine respect for law without being, to that extent, an enemy to law and orderly government.

"From the standpoint of the Government, the only sound view is that of law enforcement. Whatever differences of opinion exist in the views as to the wisdom of some of these laws can be of no concern to the agencies for law enforcement. The executive department can not make the laws. It is especially true that it can not nullify laws. To refuse or to neglect to enforce a valid enactment of the legislative department of government, or to enforce it mechanically or half-heartedly, or to wink at its violation, is without justification on any sound theory of government.

"The Government will endure on the rock of law enforcement or it will perish in the quicksands of lawlessness.

"As a citizen can not choose what laws he will obey, so likewise those charged with law enforcement can not choose what laws they will enforce. The only sound position for those who favor respect for law to take is that those charged with law enforcement must enforce all the laws, and all good citizens must obey all the laws. Neither can exercise any right of choice in this matter without placing themselves above the law.

"Those who do not believe in our Government and the enforcement of our laws should go to a country which gives them their peculiar liberty.

"My duty is clear. As long as I am the responsible head of the Department of Justice the law will be enforced with all the power possessed by the Government which I am at liberty to call to my command."

To all of this I add not only my indorsement but I pledge this: These principles shall be my principles; and as long as I am connected with the Department of Justice they shall be the Genesis of its present policy and the gospel of its New Testament.

Deplorable, but true, in our cities, in our States, yes, in the Federal Government we have officials, men sworn to uphold the honor of their country and preserve its Constitution who have, who are, and who will continue to subvert their Nation's cause to their own personal prosperity. Others there are who, because of political honor or personal friendship, or perhaps stronger influences, will allow illegal practices to be perpetrated and the law to be set at naught. The law is not made for a certain few; it is not enacted to be enforced against some and vacated against others. It is a beacon for all—for the poor, for the rich, for the Jew and the gentile, for the white and for the black, and for the high and the low. It chooses none and rejects none. It stands, proclaiming to the world, "Thou shalt not break," and when that commandment is broken the Nation should bend its efforts to see that atonement is made, no matter who may be the offender, no matter how high his rank or how low his station. The quickest and surest way of setting any law at naught is to relax its enforcement, while the quickest and surest way of instilling respect for the law in the hearts of a people is to vigorously press its enforcement.

We can say with pride, and I repeat it with hope, that the peak of lawlessness has been reached and passed and our national institutions left intact. And why? Because we had and have men in our State and Federal Governments who were not afraid to dig into the slime of this nasty, dirty graft and bring these treacherous vampires of corruption to the bar of justice, where, with a return of fear, they may be taught that there is "a God in Israel." Our Government and our constitutions embody the wisdom of the ages, and they are not to be overthrown by the whims or the depravity of those who speculate in public justice and view it as an article of personal favor. The parasites that fatten on crime and live on human sin shall not be permitted to traffic in our liberties and vulturelike sink their gorging beaks into our constitutions and our laws. I do not believe that men are inherently bad; it is only when the temptations are strong and men have not strength enough to resist that they violate the moral and statute laws. But the man who can not obey the law, the man who can not fearlessly enforce the law, and with the courage of his convictions bring before our judicial tribunals every dastardly and contemptible crook, no matter how high his rank, has no place in our system. Such a man fosters disrespect for the law by feeble enforcement, and, lacking in courage, he fails in the prime requirements of his obligations and undertakings. Many such an official also takes refuge in a too great discretion, and in the interpretation of statutes clothes himself with the unwarranted prerogatives of legislative and executive powers.

As bearing upon this question and reflecting as it does the sentiment of the bench and bar of the Nation, I invite your attention to the report recently presented and unanimously adopted by the judicial section of the American Bar Association:

"The judicial section of the American Bar Association, venturing to speak for all the judges, wishes to express this warning to the American people: Reverence for law and enforcement of law depends mainly upon the ideals and customs of those who occupy the vantage ground of life in business and society. The people of the United States, by solemn constitutional and statutory enactment, have undertaken to suppress the age-long evil of the liquor traffic.

"When, for the gratification of their appetites or the promotion of their interests, lawyers, bankers, great merchants and manufacturers, and social leaders, both men and women, disobey and scoff at this law or any other law, they are aiding the cause of anarchy and promoting mob violence, robbery, and homicide; they are sowing dragon's teeth, and they need not be surprised when they find that no judicial or police authority can save our country or humanity from reaping the harvest."

Here you have the views of those best qualified to express such an opinion. Law and government are, and always have been, but one expression of the life of the people. Law is regulative rather than generative. It is simply part and parcel of a people's life. It is a part of their life like their social habits and their language, and as such it must grow with their growth and wither with their decay. Every great reform which has been effected by law has consisted not in doing something new but in undoing something old. The most valuable additions made to legislation have been enactments destructive of previous legislation; and the best laws which have been passed have been those by which former laws were repealed. Law as it reflects the social expression is more or less idealistic. It embodies the new chapter in the story of man's struggle upward. The United States always has offered the richest free gift ever spread out before civilized man. It has ever been from its colonial period an exit into a freer life and a greater well-being than was ever before within the grasp of mankind. It demands the best and it always gives in return the chance for indefinite ascent in the scale of personal advancement. Never again can such an opportunity come to the sons of men where to each are offered the gifts after his own will. It gave to the pioneer a restless energy, a quick capacity for judgment and action, a belief in liberty, freedom of opportunity, and a resistance to the domination of class. America has always meant to the immigrants from the Old World the opportunity to destroy the bonds of social caste and to hew out for themselves in a new country a destiny and a career proportioned to the powers that God gave them. In a word, it has and it does to-day offer to everyone a chance to win a larger life than any other land in the world. This conception has vitalized American democracy and has brought it into sharp contrasts with the democracies of history and with "those modern efforts of Europe to create an artificial democratic society by legislation." The problem of the United States is, therefore, not to create democracy but to conserve democratic institutions and ideals, to the end that civic power shall dominate and individual achievement shall grow for the common good. American democracy practices the high diplomacy of truthful speech, the consummate tact of undivided attention. It dares to seize right with a giant's grasp, assume responsibility at any hazard, and suffer sacrifice without pretense. It capitulates to no unworthy cause, but carries its flag high at the point of a clear and a blameless conscience.

"She lives for those who love her,
For the land that holds her true,
For the cause that lacks assistance,
And the good that she can do."

A keen observer of American affairs well said:

"One does not find in America anything one does not find in Europe; but one finds in Europe what one does not find in America. America has, broadly speaking, no waste products. The wreckage, everywhere evident in Europe, is not evident there. Men do not lose their self-respect, they win it; they do not drop out, they work in. This is the great result not of American institutions or ideals, but of American opportunities."

True as this is, there is on every hand evidence that the world disease of social unrest still affects us. All classes are more or less influenced. A striking indication is that very many people feel that they have been exploited for the benefit of someone else, and that the time has now come for the cure of all human ills. This is largely due to mental listlessness—a conception that sees no light in the grey, and seeks refuge in hope, trusting that the way out of the storm will soon appear. Such people are the easy victims of the catch phrases of the day. New words coined to lead those who allow others to think for them mean very little to practical people. "Making the world safe for democracy;" "splendid isolation;" and "tying your destiny to a star," mean absolutely nothing. They appeal to the emotions and catch the crowd. They take the place of sweet music when the lights are low, but there is nothing to them when the sun rises the next day and the air is full of ozone. There can be no better days, unless we make them, unless we determine that there shall be better days. We are surrounded by impalpable foes. We are like the shipwrecked folk in "The Tempest," when the harpies swooped down from the mysterious air and carried away the feast from the banqueting table. The world is burdened with leaders, and each cries out to the multitude that he has found a way out. More wages and less work, more work and less wages, profit sharing, State ownership, destruction of capital, international socialism, and the rights of democratic free government. Everyone knows that there is no solution in any of them. This mundane sphere is a very old habitat and all of these ways have been followed, and they all return to the same place. They each appeal to self-interest, a powerful but far from supreme motive. The ultimate fact is that man does not live by bread alone but by faith, even though he does not know it. The secret of all progress in any field is unbounded optimism, which is just another name for faith, or, perhaps, it is possibly better to say that the imaginative act of faith is endowed with the power of making that which it wills come to pass, because the greater the number of people determining upon the same thing, the greater the result. It is for this reason that we must stop throughout the entire world to-day and take stock—that is, collectively agree to compromise and readjust, because all law is a living and growing organism that changes as the relations of society change. How many people reflect that democracy in its essence is a theory of life and government? There has been an attempt to confuse it with bolshevism. This is most unfortunate. Bolshevism is a class concept. It has its origin in class consciousness, and it is purely and simply proletarian autocracy. It has no more connection with the democracy of America than heaven with hell. It is kaiserism standing on its head and governing the world with its feet. It advances by physical force. It knows no law but might, and it seeks to substitute despotism for the freedom which mankind has struggled to obtain. The fact is, the divine prophecy of democracy has been fulfilled here in America.

And may I venture a prophecy—it is uppermost in your minds—that the American ideal, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are born with equal rights, is the most potent and moral ideal in all the world. All this country needs is to be true to herself, and she will save and lead mankind. No one knows these facts better than the American citizen who thinks and reflects for himself. He knows, too, that efforts to reform the world at one fell swoop or to readjust the vast disarray that succeeds the cataclysm of war are predoomed to fail. He realizes that the dissensions now existing are not exceptional, but rather the unavoidable consequences of most unusual causes. He knows that the danger element in the entire world to-day is the man who teaches the people to want what they can not have. He realizes that it is the suggestion of selfishness directed to susceptible minds that is preventing people from accepting conditions as they are and beginning the slow progress of building up again. Everyone realizes, even the agitator himself, that the first principle of citizenship is respect for the rights of others and the interests of the community as a whole. Nature will not yield her gifts except in return for effort. Agitation, confusion, idleness, and absolute contempt for the rights of others mean debt, poverty, hunger, and misery. It is a sad commentary upon our credulity and our hospitality that after we have opened our doors to those who pleadingly sought liberty, we must now be outraged by the very people to whom we encouragingly held out an inviting and helping hand. We welcome to-day, as we did in the past, those who love liberty, those who become American citizens without any mental reservations or purposes of evasion, but we have no room for those who would have us exchange our liberty and freedom for isms and licentious license. Such people, as the Attorney General so well says, "should go to a country which gives them their peculiar liberty," and I would add, if they do not go to such a country and remain to violate the laws of this Government, I pledge you to find a place, make a place in some Government institution, where—in their solitary, individual grandeur—they can set up a government of their own and be the monarch of all they survey.

Speaking upon the question of law and order, Dr. Wayne B. Wheeler, the general counsel of the Anti-Saloon League, has aptly and with characteristic terseness in a most timely article described the results that follow a reign of lawlessness. After referring to a prophecy of Lord Macaulay, who predicted that the civilization of the United States would be destroyed by lawlessness engendered within her own institutions, he said:

"For officers or the people to permit laws to be violated is a deadly attack upon the Government. Its contagion spreads from one law to another. It distills its deadly poison into the arteries of our jurisprudence. It palsies the power of honest officials. It assassinates the process of orderly control. It is a prolific source of disease to the whole social order, and jeopardizes the life of the race."

It is only by vigorous enforcement of all laws—not one law—that the great purpose of this Government can be accomplished. Any laxity in the law's execution removes the coercive power just as fully as though there were no laws. Enforcement is the stimulant, the coercive, which the weak require to enable them to obey the law, and it is only in this way that respect for the law and our institutions can be restored and maintained.

We are at the crossroads. We are facing the problems of a new age, the dangers of a highly developed civilization. We have expected a measure of unrest. We realize that there must be cooperation and coordination. We appreciate that the world to-day is just as confused and perplexed as ancient Babylon. The difference in ideals and ideas is just as much a Babel of conflicting interests as a Babel of voices was obstructive of national unity in the days of the Biblical tower. We know that we must stop thinking in terms of class and begin to think in terms of the United States. This can not be accomplished until we drive out suspicion, envy, and hate, and put big ideas in the place of small ones. The issue before this country to-day is Americanism, and the sooner we clean the melting pot and throw out the slag the better for all concerned. If the man with capital owes a duty to the public, the man who works with his hands can not escape the correlative obligation. Every man who labors with head or hands is a national servant; otherwise he has no rights either as a citizen or an individual under our form of government.

If the Government of the United States will pinch off the cooties, whether they be capitalists, socialists, bolshevists, or labor leaders and compel them to obey the law, because it is the will of the majority, the collective reason and justice of the people, it will win the peace of the world. I know this can be done, and as far as it lies within the power of the Attorney General and myself, speaking for the Department of Justice, it will be done. It can not be done without the assistance of all the people. It can not be done if those who enforce the law are not looked upon as the attorneys for all the people. It can not be done unless the efforts of those who have sworn to preserve the law have the support of a majority of the people who believe in the law. The Department of Justice here—or in every district where it is represented—can not execute a single law without the people. The greatest power in all this land is in the jury box, and it is there that the people accept or reject the laws which their representatives enact. It is well to remember the words of Carlyle:

"There is justice here below, and even at the bottom there is nothing else but justice. Forget that and thou hast forgotten all."

These are grave and serious problems. They threaten the integrity of our institutions, if not the very existence of this Republic. We belong not to ourselves, but to the world. We can not rest upon our past, decided and glorious as it is. It is the future with which we are concerned. The conditions of life are ever changing, and the experiences of the fathers are rarely the experiences of the sons. The questions presented to us are not the founding of a great nation, but the preservation of one already old. The socialist says America is not truly democratic because the people are not all the same. But when did democracy guarantee the similarity of people and "grade mankind down to a dead level"? Democracy is no miracle worker. It declares and it does guarantee this: That men unequal in abilities shall be equal in their rights to develop their capacities. Every avenue must be open and every opportunity free. The instances in this country where the poor and the lowly rise to eminence and fame are not accidents. They are the best proof of an equality among men in the only sense in which equality is possible, equality of opportunity.

The future rests with us. The fate of humanity may be in our hands, because democracy can save or destroy the world. The pleading voice of a war-torn world, choked with the sob of the ages, is lifted to us. It beseeches us, in the name of God, in the name of charity, in the name of freedom, in the name of justice, to be consistent, law-abiding, generous, and true, lest we, too, may go the way of the earlier nations. And it is just at this point that I would emphasize that the Republic needs men, God-gifted men, of character, purity, vigor, and judgment. It needs men to stand in the hard places and fight the hard battles. It needs men to answer its questions and to solve its problems. It needs men whose lives appeal to our intellect, arouse our ideals, and touch the best in all of us. In short, this Nation to-day needs men who are not afraid of the demagogues and the unprincipled politicians who for selfish and sordid reasons tell the people that they are continually being cheated, deceived, and tricked, until confidence is destroyed and honor always questioned. It needs men with initiative and convictions. It needs men who have ideals, and who rely upon them for success. It needs men who will not disturb the public mind by teaching it to want. It needs men who will not disappoint the people with the promise of things they can not have and which they should not have. It needs men who will always do the very best they can, just where and as they are; men with sufficient self-abnegation to permit their laboring in obscurity, smiling in adversity, and waiting in patience. We have had altogether too much of a leadership that sees in every public question or national law the opportunity to make the public subservient to its private personal interest. We must look to the young men of ideals, men yet unspoiled by the cynical touch of the sordidness of the world, men who have courage and are capable of tremendous self-sacrifice. We should make it our duty to find such men among the mentally and spiritually young, not among the men who cringe before power and grow morally flabby in the presence of opportunity. We must look among those who, while they respect the past for the good it has produced, believe that the present and the future are all important. We must look to men who would rather be social exiles, having the testimony of an approving conscience, than be guests in kings' houses. Such men will proclaim and teach that American institutions and American law are the great bulwark behind which the forces of liberty are intrenched, and that the American Constitution is the outward and visible means by which the blessings of liberty have been secured. Such men will impose the principles of Americanism upon all newcomers and defend those principles against all attacks. Such men will do their work with enthusiasm, not for gain but because it is part of the plan. Such men will quit their obligations to the Commonwealth and render good account of themselves when the "Master of all good workmen" shall sum up their lives.

There is a great painting that tells of American activity—a prairie schooner with its oxen toiling westward, bearing a family to some undiscovered home. Above the caravan hover the angels of hope and faith and love, pointing the way to go. Below is the spirit of commercialism and above the spirit of idealism, and the plodding life of America marches on between the angels and the soil. In the conflict of these two forces lies the problem of our future. Are we to be the victims of our own prosperity, robbed by the very magnitude of our wealth, or shall we go on under the leadership of the wisest and the best?

This country in its government should reflect the purity, the order, the patience, and the virtue of every home within its boundaries. It will not be the government we intend it to be until such is the case. It will never be such a country until we show a willingness to forget self in the opportunity to serve, a willingness to sacrifice in time, thought, and means for the sake of all. This is the best of the civilizations. There is no room for any thought except liberty, individuality, and the right to be free. Our fathers before us solved every problem that confronted them. They feared God and loved liberty, and though they sleep in the narrow trenches of death, their imperishable spirit lives in the American citizen of to-day and will live throughout all the years to come. They lived and fought and died that we might be free. Their sons in France sought in sacrifice an opportunity that our flag might be unspotted and unstained. They willingly died that all men beneath its folds should bear no chains nor live in dishonor, while a single star shone in the firmament of God. We shall keep the faith with our dead—fathers, sons, and brothers. If we break it, they will not sleep, "though the poppies grow in Flanders fields." And if we find that we can not keep the faith without reserve, we should acknowledge that our civilization is a failure, and that we are too material to idealize the proud realities of life and respect the memories of those who so recently went forth to fight and die that moral values might survive, liberty be vindicated, and Christian civilization emerge to its final triumph. We shall back this Republic of our fathers, their sons, and our brothers against the world, and because justice is greater than power we know that this land, hallowed with the tears and the hopes of our sacred dead, shall, if we do our very best, live to scatter the riches of human liberty to races yet unborn and advance the cause of civilization that law and order, freedom, and peace shall always be preserved.

The law must be, and it shall be, enforced as it is conceived and written, and always without fear or favor. And so to you, and through you, I bring the pledge that in so far as it lies within the power of the Department of Justice to execute and enforce the law of the land there will be no backward step, no retreat, in preserving the Constitution and carrying out the mandate of the people.

CLERICAL SERVICE IN PORTO RICO.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, on yesterday I offered a resolution relating to certain information desired concerning employees in the Territory of Porto Rico, which I asked should lie on the table. I ask that the resolution may be read now.

The Assistant Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 183) submitted yesterday by Mr. KING, as follows:

Whereas it is claimed that since Porto Rico was acquired by the United States an inordinately large proportion of the officials and clerical personnel of the Territorial and of the local government have been persons who went to Porto Rico from the United States in order to occupy such positions, and that since March 4, 1921, a large additional number of persons have gone from the United States to Porto Rico to fill various official positions in the Territorial and local government, and that such condition is a cause of complaint of dissatisfaction in the island: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of War is directed to report to the Senate a complete list of the number of persons holding positions in the Territorial government and local government, including the clerical personnel on the 4th of March, 1921, who were not natives of Porto Rico, and also a complete list of the persons who have, since March 4, 1921, been appointed to positions, including clerical personnel, in the Territorial government and local government who are not natives of Porto Rico.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE PEACE FLAG.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Senate resolution 176, submitted by Mr. WALSH of Montana on the calendar day of November 23, 1921, as follows:

Whereas at a meeting of the Interparliamentary Union and World's Peace Congress peace flags of many nations have been displayed, made by adding a white border to each national flag; and

Whereas the United States flag, thus bordered as a peace flag, was carried by the first United States ship that passed through the Panama Canal, the Cristobal, a flag now in the custody of the Daughters of the American Revolution at the Capital of the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate hereby requests the President to authorize United States delegates at the Conference on Limitation of Armament now sitting at the city of Washington to display such a flag at the conference.

Mr. SMOOT. The resolution comes over under the rule?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a resolution coming over from a previous day under the rule.

Mr. SMOOT. I would like to ask the Senator from Montana if he desires to have it referred to any special committee?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should like to have the resolution taken up for consideration without referring it to a committee, because if there is going to be any opposition to it whatever I shall not press the resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. I assure the Senator that there will be opposition to it, and if I can defeat it I am going to do so. I will also say to the Senator that I have not counted the number, but I have received resolutions from Grand Army of the Republic organizations opposing the resolution. I have also received similar protests from many women's organizations of the country. I do not know that I have ever known any subject before the Senate that has been so universally protested against by every patriotic organization in the country, and I certainly shall do all I can to see that the resolution is defeated.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, in view of the statement of the Senator from Utah I have no desire at all to press the resolution for consideration. I may say, however, that I do not share in any measure whatever the sentiments of the Senator from Utah with respect to this matter.

The flag may be displayed as the United States flag, but it has a white border to indicate that in this particular instance the United States flag is on a mission of peace and not on a mission of war. That is all there is to it. I can very well understand the sentiment of the very good people who have addressed the Senator from Utah with respect to it; I have encountered that same sentiment on other occasions; it is a very proper sentiment which prohibits the use of the United States flag for any advertising purpose. That sentiment has found expression in the statutes of many States and very wisely so; I am in hearty accord with it; but I would naturally think that the good people, if they should reflect upon the matter at all, would see some difference between using the flag for advertising purposes and calling attention to the fact that in a particular building the delegates of the United States are concerned in a great mission of peace. It would scarcely come under the designation of advertising to use the United States flag with a white border to indicate that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Montana that I have always understood that the Stars and Stripes was a flag of peace, an emblem of peace.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So it is, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think it is necessary to have a white border or any other kind of a border around the flag to indicate that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The flag is likewise an emblem of war as well, and it has been carried in the forefront of our troops on this continent and on the continent of Europe in some of the bloodiest engagements in which men ever participated.

Mr. SMOOT. But the ultimate purpose was to obtain peace.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That, however, is neither here nor there.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana if the coloring of the flag is not fixed by law?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I should like to ask the Senator if he did not see the yellow border on the flag in the other House on yesterday, and to inquire by what authority that yellow coloring was there?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I did not see that.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. There is such a yellow border on the flag there.

Mr. POINDEXTER. A "yellow streak" would very appropriately represent those who want to abandon the flag of the United States and what it stands for.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I do not quite catch the drift of the remarks of the Senator from Washington, but I do know—at least it is my impression—that the flag behind the Vice President is colored according to law and that the law has never been changed. So when I saw the yellow stripe around the flag which was displayed on yesterday in the House of Representatives in the joint session of the two Houses, as a law-abiding, patriotic American I felt some indignation that any coloring should be on the flag except that fixed by law. I am asking now by what authority the House of Representatives displays a flag there that is different from that which is displayed in this Chamber? The flag there displayed has a yellow border, and a very broad one at that, and it does not improve the looks of the flag, either.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Georgia that I can not answer his question in reference to the yellow border on the flag displayed on yesterday in the House of Representatives, nor did I notice it. If I had, I should have made remarks similar to those which have been made by the Senator from Georgia upon this occasion.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I am quite sure that the Senator from Utah would have done so.

Mr. SMOOT. However, I am going to ask the Senator from Montana if he would not be satisfied to have the resolution go to the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If there is the slightest objection to the resolution, I have not any disposition to press it; it would be useless to pass the resolution unless it were done by unanimous consent. Accordingly, Mr. President, as the Senator from Utah is insistent upon his objection to the resolution, I ask that it be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. Morning business is closed.

CONSIDERATION OF UNOBJECTED CASES ON THE CALENDAR.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I understand that the Committee on Finance desires to continue its hearings at 2 o'clock. The Committee on Appropriations also desires to continue its hearing. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the calendar under Rule VIII and only consider unobjected measures.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES of Washington. With the understanding that if there is no urgent business of the Senate to consume the remainder of to-day and to-morrow that we shall take up the calendar and dispose of bills under Rule VIII, I have no objection.

Mr. CURTIS. The intention was that the session should run until 2 o'clock to-day and that the Senate should then take an adjournment. Then, I thought that on to-morrow we could by motion take up bills which are on the calendar, if we shall adjourn early this afternoon. A request has been made by the chairmen of committees to which I have referred that we adjourn this afternoon in order that Senators may in committee prepare some measures for the consideration of the Senate to-morrow or the next day.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I hope that we may to-day take up unobjected bills on the calendar, and that on to-morrow we may consider bills on the calendar by motion, and that they may be then disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection the request of the Senator from Kansas is granted. The Secretary will state the first bill on the calendar.

DUTIES OF UNITED STATES JUDGES.

The bill (S. 384) to require judges appointed under authority of the United States to devote their entire time to the duties of a judge was announced as first in order on the calendar.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, some Senators who desire to speak on the bill are absent, and I am going to ask that it go over. I desire to say, however, that I expect to call it up early after Christmas and to urge its passage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill goes over.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 214) to amend section 24 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 581) to repeal the act prohibiting increased pay under lump-sum appropriations to employees transferred within one year was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 582) to repeal section 5 of the act approved June 22, 1906, entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes," was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING and Mr. SMOOT asked that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1439) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 27, 1918, as amended by the act of July 11, 1919, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1467) to carry into effect the findings of the Court of Claims in favor of Elizabeth White, administratrix of the estate of Samuel N. White, deceased, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

STABILIZATION OF COAL INDUSTRY.

The bill (S. 1807) to aid in stabilizing the coal industry was announced as next in order.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I understand that under Rule VIII there is a limitation of five minutes on speeches. I wish to give notice that at some future date, within the next two weeks, I shall speak upon the coal question and upon this particular bill.

Mr. KING. I presume the Senator desires that the bill go over at the present time.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes; I ask that the bill go over for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

BILLS, ETC., PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 205) relating to the fiscal system of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. That bill will take some time. Let it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1016) to amend an act entitled "An act to repeal section 3480 of the Revised Statutes of the United States" was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1375) to prohibit and punish certain seditious acts against the Government of the United States and to prohibit the use of the mails for the purpose of promoting such acts was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I have been requested by a Senator to ask that that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 12) authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 13,902 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I think that joint resolution had better go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under objection of the Senator from Utah the joint resolution will be passed over.

The resolution (S. Res. 67) authorizing the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments to hold hearings here or elsewhere and to employ a stenographer to report the same was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. KING, and Mr. SMOOT asked that the resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

DAYLIGHT SAVING IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (S. 1855) to save daylight in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. WADSWORTH and Mr. KING asked that the bill go over.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I think that the bill might as well go to the calendar under Rule IX; and I ask that that order be made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request that the bill be placed on the calendar under Rule IX? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 63) for the relief of Lester A. Rockwell was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 491) to provide without expenditure of Federal funds the opportunities of the people to acquire rural homes, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

DR. O. H. TITTMANN.

The bill (S. 136) for the relief of Dr. O. H. Tittmann, former Superintendent of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that that bill go over.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, before the bill goes over under objection, I should like to make a brief statement as to its purport, to which I trust the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] will listen. The bill is for the relief of Dr. O. H. Tittmann, who for many years was at the head of the Coast and Geodetic Survey of this country, and was in the service of the United States for 47 years. At one time while he was attending to the regular duties of his office he also served without compensation as a member of the United States and Canadian Boundary Line Commission. I presume it is perfectly fair to say that he has performed thousands upon thousands of dollars of service for the Government without pay. The facts of the case are that if Dr. Tittmann, who is now very old and who retired in 1915, had retired a year or two later he would have been retired with the rank of captain and would have received $3,750 a year for the remainder of his life; but he retired just before that provision of law was made. The department and the committee felt that certainly some recognition ought to be given to Dr. Tittmann after 47 years of service to the Government. The committee have brought in a report which seems to me inadequate, and yet it does recognize his service and allows him for the remainder of his life $150 a month. I am wondering whether under the circumstances I have stated the Senator from Utah will not allow the Senate to act upon the bill now.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think we had better let it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill goes over.

BILL PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 2051) to amend section 3142 of the Revised Statutes, to permit an increase in the number of collection districts for the collection of internal revenue and in the number of collectors of internal revenue from 64 to 74, was announced as next in order.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask that that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

COMMITMENTS TO REFORMATORY INSTITUTIONS.

The bill (S. 1010) to amend sections 5549 and 5550 of the Revised Statutes of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I ask that that bill go over.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, in regard to the bill, the title of which has just been read, I desire to make a brief statement in the hope that the next time that bill comes up for consideration upon the calendar the Senator from Georgia will permit its consideration. Personally, I have no interest whatever in the measure; I am not the father of the bill, and had nothing at all to do with its introduction. The Committee on the Judiciary was petitioned by the Department of Justice to report favorably such proposed legislation. In brief the situation is as follows: The existing statute provides in the case of juvenile offenders convicted of certain offenses that the judge may commit them to some reformatory institution or industrial school, instead of directing that they be confined in a county jail or a penitentiary. The Department of Justice wanted the provisions of the act extended so that in the case of female offenders found guilty of offenses against chastity similar action might be taken; that they might be sent to some reformatory institution, instead of beng sent to a common jail or to a penitentiary. The bill to which the Senator from Georgia objects is intended to accomplish that purpose.

It will be borne in mind that it applies only to females convicted of certain offenses. If the bill does not pass, the judge will have no discretion but must send the offender to the county jail or to the penitentiary, as the case may be. It is a question whether it is not less objectionable to send such offenders to reformatory institutions of some kind than to send them to county jails, and under the existing law, as I have stated, the judge is without discretion; he must send them to prison. Under this bill he would have the option of sending them to some institution existing for the purpose of attempting to reform such female offenders.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, in order that my colleagues will not think that my objection is captious, least of all personal to the Senator who is sponsoring the bill, I will state that I investigated this matter some time ago; and, while I am speaking from recollection and do not pretend to be entirely accurate, I think that, on the whole, my statement will be found to be true.

The proposition of this bill is to turn over to private institutions persons who are convicted of crime in Federal courts. As a lawyer and as a citizen and as a Senator, it seems to me entirely wrong to establish a system by which private institutions of any kind are furnished free labor and are given complete control, in other States, of persons convicted of crime in the State where that crime was committed.

In a very famous case in my own State there was a witness needed by the prosecution, and the prosecution, which was being conducted in Atlanta, had to send for a witness who was being confined in Ohio, after she had been convicted in the police court of Atlanta. That witness was taken from a private institution, brought to the city of Atlanta, gave her testimony, and was returned to that private institution in Ohio.

Since the day that I made the first objection to this extension of that law so as to include all women of whatever age—not merely juvenile offenders but offenders of any kind—I have been furnished with evidence of a woman convicted in a State court of Georgia and sent to an institution in Baltimore.

Mr. President, I do not, of course, doubt the right of the Federal authorities to send their prisoners to any penitentiary or other place of confinement chosen by law in any other State, but the evil that I am trying to strike at is the taking into the jurisdiction of Federal courts offenses that are purely municipal or State. The State has jurisdiction to try, convict, or acquit.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. With pleasure.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. This bill does not extend the jurisdiction of the Federal courts at all. It simply provides that when, under the existing laws of the United States, a female is convicted of one of these offenses, she may then be sent to a house of refuge or reformatory institution instead of being sent to jail. The bill does not extend the crimes at all. It simply provides that when a female is convicted of one of these crimes under the law of the municipality this action may be taken.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I can not with propriety use language which would describe the crime which this bill seeks to embrace, but that crime may be readily supposed, and it falls strictly within the jurisdiction of the States and the State courts are constantly dealing with it. The States have their reformatories for boys and for girls.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I venture to interrupt the Senator again to read from the bill, as follows:

> Whenever a woman or girl shall be convicted of lewdness, prostitution, or similar offenses, under circumstances rendering such offense punishable by imprisonment under the laws of the United States, such woman or girl may be confined, during the term of sentence, in some home of refuge to be designated by the Attorney General.

Mr. President, the Senator does not have the experience in his State that we do in ours. We have five Indian reservations within our State. Such crimes committed upon an Indian reservation are crimes against the laws of the United States. The State courts have no jurisdiction whatever over those reservations. If a girl or a woman is convicted of any of these crimes committed upon an Indian reservation the statute becomes applicable to her; that is all.

The Senator says that these are offenses which ought to be taken care of by the State. If they happen within the State jurisdiction they are taken care of by the State; but they become amenable to the laws of the United States when they occur within an Indian reservation or some other place under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. Take the great public parks, the national parks out West; they are all under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. Any one of these offenses committed within those areas is punishable under the laws of the United States and not under the laws of the States.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I shall not take the time of the Senate by debate on this subject, but I will add simply this: I am opposed, as a matter of principle, to giving the Attorney General the power of leasing out convicts, and this legislation does that very thing. It enables the Attorney General to make contracts for the labor of persons so convicted, and I do not think the Attorney General ought to have that power.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I can not allow that statement to go unchallenged. There is nothing in the bill which authorizes the Attorney General to let out these convicts or any other convicts. There is nothing in the bill which even gives warrant for such a suggestion as that. That policy, prevailing in some States, I think is almost universally condemned by public sentiment in this country, and I would not have it thought that the Attorney General would even propose a measure of that character to the Congress of the United States.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, a final word. I must take issue with the Senator from Montana. I can not be entirely mistaken in my reading of the statute furnished me some time ago. The Attorney General already has the power to do that, I am sorry to say, to a certain extent, and this bill simply proposes to enlarge that power so as to embrace all females. If I had my way, I would repeal that kind of legislation, because I think it is inherently wrong.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection having been made, the bill will be passed over.

BILLS, ETC., PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 62) for the relief of Charles K. Bond, alias Kimball W. Rollins, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The resolution (S. Res. 73) amending Rules XXXVII and XXXVIII of the Standing Rules of the Senate so as to provide for the consideration of nominations and treaties in open executive session, unless otherwise ordered, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WADSWORTH and Mr. McKELLAR. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1829) for the relief of Walter Runke, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2022) promoting civilization and self-support among the Indians of the Mescalero Reservation, in New Mexico, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I have spoken to the chairman of the committee, Mr. President, and it is agreed that that bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 7) to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate the business of loaning money on security of any kind by persons, firms, and corporations other than national banks, licensed bankers, trust companies, savings banks, building and loan associations, and real estate brokers in the District of Columbia," approved February 4, 1913, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 496) for the relief of George A. Robertson, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 985) to amend the provisions of an act relating to certain railway corporations owning or operating street railways in the District of Columbia, approved June 5, 1920, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1771) to authorize the United States, through the United States Shipping Board, to acquire a site on Hazzell Island, St. Thomas, Virgin Islands, for a fuel and fuel-oil station and fresh-water reservoir for Shipping Board and other merchant vessels, as well as United States naval vessels, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I ask that that bill may go over for the day. I desire to get some further information in reference to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1063) for the relief of the owners of the schooner Charlotte W. Miller was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, this is a bill introduced by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] to send to the Court of Claims a claim for injuries resulting from a collision with a naval vessel. It is a bill that has passed the Senate, and has been reported on favorably by the Committee on Claims of the House. I wonder if the Senator from Utah thinks——

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1856) to reimburse Horace A. Choumard, chaplain in the Twenty-third Infantry, for loss of certain personal property was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1535) for the relief of the estate of Catherine Locke, deceased, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 48) authorizing retirement as warrant officers of certain Army field clerks and field clerks Quartermaster Corps was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 405) for the relief of Harold Kernan was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1281) for the relief of Capt. Edward T. Hartmann, United States Army, and others, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like some explanation in regard to that measure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been requested that it go over.

J. P. D. SHIEBLER.

The bill (S. 1541) for the relief of J. P. D. Shiebler was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, does the junior Senator from Utah desire an explanation of the bill?

Mr. KING. I reserve the right to object until I hear the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not wish to pry into the mind of the Senator from Utah, but does the Senator object to the bill after having examined it and the conditions which gave rise to its introduction and report?

Mr. KING. Frankness compels me to state to the Senator that I examined the bill quite fully some time ago, but the facts have escaped my memory in part. I shall be glad to have the Senator state what the facts are.

Mr. WADSWORTH. These are the facts which gave rise to the introduction of the bill and its report by the Committee on Military Affairs: As the Senator knows, the War Department, in accordance with the law passed by the Congress, held examinations for commissions——

Mr. KING. The facts have come back to me now, Mr. President, and I withdraw the objection.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want an explanation of the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The War Department, pursuant to the law, held a large number of examinations for commissions in the Regular Army. There were 14,000 applicants for such commissions, and something like 5,600 passed and were commissioned in the several grades.

Maj. Shiebler was an emergency officer during the war, with a very excellent record. He presented himself to take the examination. He was rejected because of a physical defect, it being alleged that his eyesight was extremely defective. It required some time for Maj. Shiebler to ascertain the cause of his rejection, and when he ascertained that he had been rejected on account of his eyesight he was extremely surprised.

To satisfy himself he had his eyes examined by some of the greatest specialists in New York City, who told him that the report of the War Department examining surgeons was evidently an error; that no such condition as reflected in the report existed in his eyes.

He thereupon asked for a reexamination. I am giving these incidents to the best of my recollection. Finally, the Surgeon General of the Army invited him to come to Washington. That invitation was issued through me. Maj. Shiebler came to Washington, and the Surgeon General sent him to Walter Reed Hospital and had his eyes examined by the Army surgeons, who frankly admitted that the first examination had resulted in an error being made, that his eyes were all right, and that he should have been admitted. It was then too late, however, for him to be commissioned in accordance with the War Department regulations.

The Military Affairs Committee, of course, had presented to it 15 or 20 cases of alleged errors in examinations, and we made a very careful examination of the most conspicuous instances. We had the then Secretary of War, Mr. Baker, before us, and after thrashing out the cases as carefully as we could, which involved reading every line of the records of the examinations, which are very voluminous and very thorough, there were two cases in which the error of the examining boards was so apparent that it was conceded by the War Department, and those two cases the committee acted upon in the form of special bills. The Shiebler case is one of them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am interested in this matter, as the Senator from New York knows. What is the relief proposed?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It authorizes his commission in the service.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator may not recall it, but I think there was a very flagrant case of injustice done to a most deserving officer from my own State.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I recollect it. The committee examined into that case at some length, and may I say to the Senator, while the case appealed to the sympathies of the committee, it resolved itself down to a question of judgment; was the judgment of the examining board correct or incorrect? When it came to cases of that kind the committee felt it wiser not to attempt to substitute its judgment for the judgment of officers who were sworn as members of examining boards.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not wonder, with the multitude of these matters which engage the attention of the Senator from New York, that the details are not present in his mind. In the case to which I refer the officer had an exceptionally fine record. He passed his examinations perfectly, but the board, acting here in the city of Washington, declined to recommend the appointment because of moral disqualifications. That finding was set aside by the Secretary of War upon the ground that there was no evidence whatever to sustain it, so that the record showed that the officer stood a perfect examination, and that there was no evidence whatever to sustain the finding of the board of a want of moral qualifications.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is the Senator's recollection absolutely accurate as to the so-called setting aside of the findings? Is it not a fact that the Secretary of War had a certain letter inserted in the record, to remain a part of the record, which would relieve this officer of certain imputations against his character; but did the Secretary of War set aside the finding of the board? I think not.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. He did. The situation was this: That the local boards conducted the usual examinations. In this case there were three examinations. As a matter of course, there was an examination on the subject of moral qualifications, one on the subject of technical qualifications, and another on the subject of his experience. The local board found that the officer met all of these tests without exception. The record was sent to the board here in Washington. The record shows that that board admitted some officer to come in and say something derogatory to the character of the officer, in perfectly plain violation of the rules themselves, which declare that the board shall pass upon the matter as the record is transmitted to them by the local examining boards. They found against him on moral grounds, and the Secretary of War, or The Adjutant General, I am now uncertain which, set that finding aside upon the ground that there was no legitimate evidence upon which it could be made. So that the record of this officer stands as perfect upon his examinations, yet he is denied the appointment.

I shall offer no objection to the bill now before the Senate, but I take this occasion to say that I shall certainly introduce a special bill for the relief of Capt. Whipps, and if this bill is passed I think it will be impossible to deny him the relief to which, in my judgment, he is entitled. I shall be very glad to again call the matter to the attention of the Committee on Military Affairs upon the appropriate reference.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to ask the Senator from New York if he has ever met Shiebler?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; I have met him.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator know that his eyes are all right?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; I can not say that his eyes are all right; I am not an oculist. He passed the examination, when he got before a board which did not make errors, and passed it with flying colors, here at Walter Reed Hospital.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly what I have in mind. If there is any earthly way for a man to pass an examination to get a promotion in the Army, he is going to pass it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. This is not a promotion; it is an original appointment.

Mr. SMOOT. He is not in the Army now, and the bill would give him a standing in the Army, which, of course, he does not occupy to-day. If he wants to go into the military service, it is virtually a promotion. I do not want to be captious about these bills, but really I do feel that I would like to know it is all right before I withhold objection.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am positive that it is all right.

Mr. SMOOT. If the bill is passed at this time, it will be pointed to for ever and ever as a precedent for every other such case. We now have a similar case called to our attention by the Senator from Montana. If this is passed, he wants to have his bill passed, and some other Senator will want to have another bill passed, and there will be no end to it all. However, if there is a real injustice done a man in an examination, of course that is another question; but I really wanted to know if the Senator had made any personal investigation of the matter.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I followed the case very closely. It all occurred during the autumn and winter of 1920.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator from Utah will permit me, I will say that in connection with the matter to which I have just adverted I found occasion to inquire into the facts of the case to which the Senator from New York now refers, and I became entirely convinced of the perfect justice of the claim and the indefensible action in that particular case. It is not surprising that in this multitude of applications which were made, some injustices should have been done. It occurs to me that it is the duty and the business of Congress to correct them wherever they do occur. There are few of them, to say the most.

Mr. SMOOT. How can a board supposed to be qualified to pass upon the physical fitness of men desiring to enter the Army make such a horrible blunder as it is said has been made in this case?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That blunder may have been a clerical blunder.

Mr. SMOOT. We would have heard of it before if it had been a clerical blunder.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The committee heard of this case months and months ago. This bill has been on the calendar for months.

Mr. SMOOT. Since June.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The committee investigated it the year before. The first examination resulted so apparently in an error that it was admitted to be an error. The clerk in copying down the dictation of the surgeon who examined this man's eyes perhaps put in the wrong figure; that went in the report, and he was rejected by the commanding officers on the ground that his eyes were in a terrible condition, when they had never been in that condition.

Mr. SMOOT. Did the Senator ask for a report from the War Department on this case?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; I did.

Mr. SMOOT. There is not any reply from the War Department included in the report.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That was before the committee. We had quite a little correspondence with the War Department about it, and the statement of facts was conceded.

Mr. SMOOT. Did they make a recommendation for this legislation?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No objection was ever interposed by the War Department to this legislation. That was the attitude taken by the War Department.

Mr. SMOOT. I would not want to do an injustice to this man, and I shall not object to the consideration of the bill; but I am afraid it will be pointed to as a precedent.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the President be, and he hereby is, authorized to appoint J. P. D. Shiebler, formerly a major of Infantry, a major of Infantry, United States Army, to date from July 1, 1920, and to be placed upon the promotion list in such place as is provided by section 24a of the act of June 4, 1920, for persons appointed officers under the provisions of section 24 of said act.

Mr. KING. In view of the fact that there must be a reduction in the number of officers in the Army, which there ought to be because of the reduction in the number of the enlisted personnel, and in view of the fact that there have been so many demotions because of the reduction of the Army, may I inquire of the Senator from New York whether this man should be reinstated as a major, because some men in the same grade have been demoted to captains following the demobilization.

Mr. WADSWORTH. All the demotions had been accomplished before these ranks took effect, so that if the President should decide to appoint him a major he would not outrank anyone who had been a major before.

Mr. KING. The Senator says if he had received his appointment, or passed an examination favorably, he would now be a major, notwithstanding the demotions and the reduction of ranks.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; the demotions only apply to old Regular Army officers who had advanced temporary rank during the war. They have all long since been demoted, in accordance with an act of Congress reported from the Military Affairs Committee. These are original appointments. No demotion can occur in an original appointment. The demotions occurred only in the rank of prewar regular officers.

Mr. KING. Do I understand from the Senator, then, that if we had, for example, 10,000 or 50,000 captains during the war, we must have the same number of captains now?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; I should hope not.

Mr. KING. I should hope not, too; but it looks to me as though pretty soon we shall have more officers than privates in the United States Army.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the Senator had better take another survey of that situation. To-day we have about 12,800 officers, according to the last figures.

Mr. KING. That includes all, from general down to second lieutenant?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That includes all grades.

Mr. KING. Then there have been separations from the service of officers, corresponding with the decrease in the number of the enlisted personnel?

Mr. WADSWORTH. There are separations on account of death, and resignations and retirements going on all the time. The officer personnel can be recruited now only through the grade of second lieutenant, and the number of second lieutenants taken in has not as yet overtaken the wastage in the upper grades.

Mr. KING. Then, as I understand the Senator, if we should recruit the privates to a considerable number, we would have to increase the number of officers, because the number of officers we now have corresponds with the number of troops we now have; that is to say, there are not too many.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am quite certain there are not too many, considering the various duties the commissioned personnel have to perform. The Senator will recollect that under statutes enacted by Congress a considerable portion of the commissioned personnel of the Army is assigned to duty other than the actual command of troops. If Congress will repeal those acts, if it will destroy the National Guard and take the Regular Army officers away from the guard as instructors and inspectors, if it will repeal the Reserve Officers' Training Corps provisions and take all the Army officers away from the schools and colleges, where they are carrying on military courses, if it will close the arsenals at Rock Island, Watervliet, Watertown, and Frankfort, at which a considerable number of officers are stationed, operating large manufacturing plants, then, of course, we could get along with fewer officers.

Mr. KING. I think we should close some of the arsenals.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (S. 2040) to provide for compulsory school attendance of children, to provide for the taking of a school census, to create the department of school attendance and work permits for the administration of this act and the act to regulate the employment of child labor in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, within the District of Columbia, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

RELIEF OF WAR CONTRACTORS AND OTHERS.

The bill (S. 32) for the relief of contractors, subcontractors, and material men who have suffered loss by reason of Government orders was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator insist upon his objection?

Mr. KING. I will withdraw the objection for the moment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. This bill has been before the Senate a number of times. It is recommended by the department and was carefully considered by the Committee on Naval Affairs. I think the purpose of it would appeal to the junior Senator from Utah. It is to relieve cases where there is an obvious equitable right. Where men, many of them small subcontractors and material men, had contracts with the Government which were interfered with by the orders of the Government in the conduct of the war certainly they ought not to be denied a remedy.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think the bill is surrounded with sufficient safeguards to protect the Government?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Absolutely it is. The question of safeguards was very thoroughly considered by the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the bill was amended in order to safeguard the Government still further.

Mr. KING. What does the Senator estimate will be the amount required to meet the claims that may be allowed under the bill?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is impossible to estimate with any exactness the amount that would be allowed. I asked that question of the department. They are unable to state. It probably would amount to more than $1,000,000, altogether.

Mr. KING. One million?

Mr. POINDEXTER. More than that, I think. I do not think it would amount to over $2,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall object to the consideration of the bill until we do know something about what it is going to cost the Government, because it seems to me that it may cost fifteen or twenty million dollars.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is impossible to tell how much it will cost until authority is given to examine into the claims.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I think the Navy Department know the claims that have been filed and the amount of the claims. That information we can get—not that the claims will be paid, I will say to the Senator, because they may not be—but I should like to know how many claims there are and what they amount to. Let the bill go over to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On objection the bill goes over.

DEVELOPMENT OF AGRICULTURAL RESOURCES.

The bill (S. 2170) to encourage the development of the agricultural resources of the United States through Federal and State cooperation, giving preference in the matter of employment and the establishment of rural homes to those who have served with the military and naval forces of the United States, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. That can not be acted upon to-day. Let it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On objection, the bill goes over.

LONGEVITY PAY FOR RESERVE OFFICERS AND NATIONAL GUARD OFFICERS.

The bill (S. 150) to provide longevity pay for reserve officers and National Guard officers serving under orders of the War Department was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator from Utah understands what the bill is and the effect of it? It would give to National Guard officers, when they are called to Washington on duty under the national defense act, the same allowances and pay that Regular officers have when performing the same duty. It affects now five officers. The Secretary of War wrote this sentence with reference to it:

The omission of the provision of the act of June 4, 1920, for longevity pay for reserve officers detailed to duty as additional members of the General Staff for this very important duty was evidently unintentional.

That is the omission this bill supplies.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly aware that where longevity pay is not given any kind of officers or anyone in the Public Health Service or anyone attached to the Government service at all, of course it is an oversight that they have not been taken care of.

I want to have the longevity pay proposition cut out entirely from the Government service unless the man has been in the Regular Army and joined the Army with that in view.

Mr. SPENCER. Will the Senator be good enough to tell me, if the provision for longevity pay is in the law and the Regular Army officers assigned to this duty are drawing it, why he would draw the line against National Guard officers when they are called upon to perform precisely the same duty? What reason is there why they should not have the same compensation?

Mr. SMOOT. Then we will have them here when they are called to duty, and the next thing we will be asked to give longevity pay to all the Reserve Corps and longevity pay to all the National Guard officers; and then we will have longevity pay for every man who enters the Army. That is what we are coming to if we follow the course that is being urged from one end of the country to the other. A propaganda is on for it now, and we might just as well understand it. So far as I am concerned I want to have it stopped.

Mr. SPENCER. I wish to have it clearly understood that the bill affects 5 officers. When there are 10 officers in the same office doing precisely the same duty and 5 of them are receiving longevity pay, why should not the other 5, simply because they are from the National Guard, receive the same allowance? That is precisely the situation to-day, and that is precisely what the bill corrects. That is precisely what the Secretary of War and his predecessor both recommend as an act of manifest justice.

Mr. SMOOT. There is quite a difference between the Regular Army and the National Guard and the Reserve Corps. It is true that the law has given longevity pay to officers in the Army. We recognize that. But if we begin this proposition now with the National Guard we shall have the same principle applying in all cases, no matter whether they are on special duty or not. Then we shall have it applying to all officers of the Reserve Corps, and we shall not only have longevity pay but commutation of quarters and everything else that is given to the Regular Army. It has been asked for the officials of the Public Health Service, and it will be asked for every other agency of our Government that can claim in any way to do service that the Army itself is doing.

I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SPENCER. Of course I recognize that under the unanimous-consent agreement it lies in the power of any Senator to prevent action, but the vision of what may happen in the future is no argument against the correction of a manifest and unintentional injustice against National Guard officers assigned to duty in Washington.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under objection the bill will go over.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 943) for the relief of John Lyons was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). On objection, the bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 7158) to amend the Army appropriation act, approved July 11, 1919, so as to release appropriations for the completion of the acquisition of real estate in certain cases and making additional appropriations therefor, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. This seems to be a bill of considerable length and involving large amounts. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, I suggest that we pass it over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On objection, the bill will go over.

The bill (S. 1565) making eligible for retirement under the same conditions as now provided for officers of the Regular Army all officers of the United States Army during the World War who have incurred physical disability in line of duty was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On objection, the bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1976) to amend the first paragraph of section 2 of the act entitled "An act to regulate the salaries of teachers, school officers, and other employees of the Board of Education of the District of Columbia," approved June 20, 1906, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there is now a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia conferring with a like committee from the House considering the question of educational matters in the District. I hope that perhaps as the result of this joint committee's efforts some constructive legislation may be suggested. In view of that fact, I think this bill had better go over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1790) to place national guardsmen who entered the World War otherwise than through the draft on equal basis as to longevity and continuous-service pay with national guardsmen who were drafted was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1075) giving permanent rank to the district superintendents of the Coast Guard on the retired list was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2265) to regulate marine insurance in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask that the bill may go over. It can not be disposed of under the unanimous-consent agreement. However, I desire to call it up at the first opportunity.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The resolution (S. Res. 115) directing an investigation of the administration of the Federal reserve system and the office of the Comptroller of the Currency was announced as next in order.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Let the resolution go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2263) to amend the Federal reserve act approved December 23, 1913, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over on objection.

The bill (H. R. 2373) to authorize associations of producers of agricultural products was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On objection, the bill will be passed over.

IMPORTATION OF SUGAR FROM ARGENTINA.

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 79) authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 5,000 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Can we not take up the joint resolution and dispose of it at the present time?

Mr. SMOOT. I know that the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] desires to be here when the joint resolution is under consideration. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] also desires to be present. I will ask that it go over.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Are we proceeding under Rule VIII?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We are proceeding by unanimous consent to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Then the provision of Rule VIII that we can take up by motion does not prevail?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does not prevail at this time. On objection, the joint resolution goes over.

CLARENCE L. REAMES.

The bill (S. 2356) for the relief of Clarence L. Reames was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On objection the bill goes over.

TRADE IN CHINA.

The bill (H. R. 4810) to authorize the incorporation of companies to promote trade in China was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

FOREIGN TRADE ZONES.

The bill (S. 2391) to provide for the establishment, operation, and maintenance of foreign trade zones in ports of entry of the United States, to expedite and encourage foreign commerce, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On objection it will go over.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

The bill (S. 2228) to amend certain sections of the Judicial Code relating to the Court of Claims was announced as next in order.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief statement about this bill. The Court of Claims is overwhelmed with business, with war claims coming in. The bill does not propose to enlarge the jurisdiction of the court in any respect beyond what is now fixed by law. It simply aims to give them a little more machinery to work more efficiently and expedite the claims. It changes the term of court, it changes the title of one officer. The title now known as "bailiff" is changed to "marshal," and the phrase "session of the court" is changed to "term of the court," and the term is changed. Otherwise it is simply to aid the court in the expedition of its business; that is all. The legislation meets with the approval of the Department of Justice and of the Court of Claims, and the bill is unanimously reported from the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Minnesota what is the salary of the clerk at the present time?

Mr. NELSON. The salary of the clerk of the court at present is $3,500. The clerks of the circuit courts of the United States and of the district courts of the United States get larger salaries than does the clerk of this court. The business of the court has very greatly increased, but the only change proposed in the salary of the clerk is an increase from $3,500 per annum to $4,500, which is less than the clerks of the circuit courts of the United States now receive.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggested to the Senator from Minnesota the other day, when he was courteous enough to call my attention to this bill, that I should not object to its consideration, but that I should object to the increase proposed by the measure in the salary of the clerk of the court. I called attention to that matter and also to one other matter, namely, the proposed limitation in the number of masters in chancery who might be appointed by the court for the purpose of taking testimony. Let me now say to the Senator from Minnesota that the clerk of the court called upon me this morning and made a very clear and frank explanation respecting the latter objection which I had, and I am inclined to think that perhaps we shall have to leave that matter to the Appropriations Committee; and if we discover that the court is abusing the right to name examiners and masters in chancery, and is shirking the duties which properly devolve upon it for the purpose of having those duties performed by masters in chancery, and by those to whom they delegate the authority to take testimony, then Congress may refuse to make the appropriations. I wish to say to the Senator now that unless the reduction as reported is made in the clerk's salary, I shall claim the right to speak upon it and to oppose such increase. I am opposed to increasing salaries now; I think it is unwise; I think it is impolitic; and I think it is unfair to the Government.

Mr. NELSON. I suggest to my good friend from Utah that he may offer an amendment covering the point to which he refers, and we may take a vote on it.

Mr. KING. I suggest that the Senator from Minnesota accept my amendment in advance, before the bill is taken up.

Mr. NELSON. I think the Senator from Utah ought to agree to some increase of the salary of the clerk of that court. The court is overwhelmed with business at the present time; millions and millions of dollars worth of claims against the Government are filed there. The clerk has more work to do than he ever previously had. The Senator from Utah well knows that we give the clerks of the circuit courts of the United States, which are purely appellate courts, a salary of $6,000 a year.

Mr. KING. We give them too much. That is the trouble with the legislation of Congress. We increase one class of salaries to-day and that action is used as a pretext for increasing the compensation of others. We act in particular instances, and raise and pyramid the salaries from time to time, to the disadvantage of the Government. I think the Senator from Minnesota ought to give us a little more time to debate this bill if he is going to insist upon the increase of salary.

Mr. NELSON. Why can not the matter go to conference?

Mr. KING. I shall be constrained to oppose the bill if there is any increase in the salary of the clerk. I shall not vote for one penny of increase in any salary at the present time, in view of the exigencies which are now confronting the Government.

Mr. NELSON. Rather than have the bill fail, for I am at the mercy of the Senator from Utah——

Mr. KING. I do not want to object to the consideration of the bill if the Senator will accept the amendment.

Mr. NELSON. I do not feel that I can accept it, but the Senator from Utah might propose a modification. Why can we not compromise and make the salary of the clerk $4,000 per annum? That is only $500 more than he is now receiving.

Mr. KING. I am not in a compromising mood this morning, although I would do almost anything for the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I hope the Senator from Utah will not delay the bill.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from Minnesota let the bill go over until we may have a little time to discuss it? I do not care to coerce the Senator by objecting unless he accepts my amendment; I think it would be unfair for me to ask that; and yet I do think that the Senator ought to give us a chance to debate the bill. We could not do that under the 5-minute rule this morning. May we not take the bill up to-morrow? I shall join with the Senator in having the bill taken up to-morrow. The Senator from Minnesota is always so courteous that I dislike very much to object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. NELSON. I think the Senator from Utah might well compromise on fixing the salary of the clerk at $4,000 per annum, in view of the fact that the clerks of the circuit courts are now receiving $6,000 per annum.

Mr. KING. I shall introduce a bill to reduce the salaries of the clerks of the circuit courts.

Mr. NELSON. Well, I leave the Senator from Utah to object, if he desires to do so.

Mr. KING. I hope the Senator will not do that.

Mr. NELSON. As I have stated, I would agree to an amendment fixing the salary at $4,000 per annum.

Mr. KING. I hope the Senator from Minnesota will not put me in the attitude of objecting to the consideration of the bill. I ask the Senator, in all kindness, will he not let the matter go over until to-morrow? I will then join with him in having the bill taken up for consideration. If the Senate wants to make the clerk's compensation $10,000, it will be for them to decide, but I desire to debate the question.

Mr. NELSON. Why can not the Senator from Utah make his motion now to amend the paragraph of the bill carrying the salary? Let the Senator now submit his amendment to that effect.

Mr. SMOOT. Why does not the Senator from Minnesota consent to let the bill go over until to-morrow instead of having its consideration now objected to?

Mr. NELSON. Why can we not dispose of the bill now? Let the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] make his motion to amend the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. It would be impossible to dispose of the bill in five minutes time; there is no doubt about that. Therefore we are merely losing time by this debate on taking it up to-day under the five-minute rule. I suggest to the Senator that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests that he does not understand that the Senate is proceeding under the five-minute rule, but that the Senate is proceeding under a unanimous-consent agreement to consider unobjected business on the calendar. Objection is made, and the bill goes over.

BILL PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 2337) to amend the transportation act, 1920, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. It would be impossible to pass that bill to-day, and I therefore ask that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Being objected to, the bill will go over.

ST. FRANCIS BARRACKS, ST. AUGUSTINE, FLA.

The bill (S. 2138) providing that the Government property known as the St. Francis Barracks, at St. Augustine, Fla., be donated to the State of Florida for military purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have not as yet received the information which I desired in connection with that bill. The Senator from Florida has spoken to me about the measure; he also desires the information I intended to obtain, and which I really expected to have at hand before to-day. Therefore I ask that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Utah if his objection to the bill would stand if there were an amendment added to this effect:

Provided, That if the State of Florida shall cease to use said property for military purposes the same shall revert to the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. That is a splendid amendment, and I will accept such an amendment freely. However, I really desire to secure information from the department as to certain aspects of the situation.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I should like to say for the information of the Senator from Utah and others that if this bill passes it will simply be a pilot for other bills that will give away Government property in every State.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I am afraid of.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. A similar movement has been made in my State, and I am opposed to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

RESOLUTION AND BILL PASSED OVER.

The resolution (S. Res. 127) to investigate the causes of factory, wholesale, and retail price conditions in the principal branches of house-furnishing goods industry and trade was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the resolution go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2135) to enable the refunding of obligations of foreign Governments owing to the United States of America, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

MELQUIADES SANCHEZ.

The bill (S. 2144) for the relief of Melquiades Sanchez was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, or benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Melquiades Sanchez, late of Company E, Second Regiment New Mexico Volunteer Infantry, and Company D, First Regiment New Mexico Volunteer Cavalry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been present with his company and regiment from October 1, 1861, to October 1, 1864; but that no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall accrue by reason of the passage of the act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDNANCE DONATION TO UNIVERSITY OF SOUTH DAKOTA.

The bill (S. 2249) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate certain obsolete ordnance to the University of South Dakota was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have understood that there was a general bill being framed, or contemplated, at any rate, to provide for the disposition of ordnance property. I do not see the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs here, and I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. JONES of Washington subsequently said: Mr. President, when Senate bill 2249 was reached on the calendar, I objected to it because I thought it related to World War trophies, and so forth, which I thought had been dealt with in general legislation. I find that we have passed through the Senate a general bill on that subject, but that Senate bill 2249 relates to Civil War ordnance; and I therefore withdraw any objection, so far as I am concerned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will recur to the bill referred to by the Senator from Washington.

The Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2249) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate certain obsolete ordnance to the University of South Dakota, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

The amendments were, on page 2, line 1, after the word "small," to insert "8 inches long," and on the same line, after the word "mortar," to strike out "large" and insert "small, 10 inches long," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to donate to the University of South Dakota, Vermillion, S. Dak., the following obsolete ordnance now on hand at Benecia Arsenal, Benecia, Calif., which were shipped to that point from the Manila ordnance depot, Manila, P. I., for the University of South Dakota: Two bronze lantakas; two bronze cannon; two iron cannon, large; two iron cannon, small; two bronze mortars, small, 8 inches long; one bronze mortar, small, 10 inches long; two iron cannon, small: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States through the delivery of any of the foregoing obsolete ordnance: Provided further, That each and every article mentioned herein shall be subject at all times to the order of the Secretary of War.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED OVER.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 183) imposing a duty of 90 per cent on all goods exported from the United States for the use of the American Expeditionary Forces and its allied forces and which have been sold to any foreign Government or person, when reimported into the United States, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that the joint resolution go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

AMERICAN ASSOCIATION OF PORT AUTHORITIES.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 45) to authorize the President to extend invitations to certain foreign nations to send delegates or representatives to the tenth annual convention of the American Association of Port Authorities, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask that that joint resolution may go to the calendar under Rule IX. I am inclined to think the time for the convention has passed. Instead of having it indefinitely postponed, however, I will merely ask that the joint resolution may go to the calendar under Rule IX.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the joint resolution will be transferred to the calendar under Rule IX.

BILLS AND RESOLUTION PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 2515) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes,' approved June 3, 1916, and to establish military justice," approved June 4, 1920, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 268) for the relief of William O. Mallahan was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over under objection.

The bill (S. 2363) to abolish the limitation on military service without the continental limits of the United States imposed by the act of Congress approved March 4, 1915, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. At the request of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], I ask that that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2035) for the relief of William M. Carroll was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The resolution (S. Res. 150) directing the Secretary of the Senate to employ a special officer for the office of the Secretary of the Senate was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask that that resolution go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be passed over.

LAND PATENTS FOR MISSIONARY OR RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATIONS.

The bill (S. 2211) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents in certain cases to missionary or religious organizations was announced as next in order.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, when the bill the title of which has just been read was under consideration some days ago the Senator from Montana asked that amendments be prepared limiting the amount of land that could be patented to the acreage actually used. If there is no objection to the consideration of the bill, I desire to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the bill has heretofore been considered as in Committee of the Whole and reported to the Senate. The bill is, therefore, now in the Senate and open to amendment. The Senator from Kansas offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. After the word "being" and before the word "used," in line 8 of page 1, it is proposed to insert the words "actually and beneficially."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, it is my fault, of course, for which I beg the pardon of the Senate, but I do not quite understand what we are acting upon.

Mr. CURTIS. It is a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents to certain religious organizations that have been conducting missions on Indian reservations. Nearly all such organizations have had patents issued to them. There are but very few of them left. This bill limits the land that may be patented to the actual amount employed for the beneficial use of the Indians, and the second amendment provides that in no case shall the amount exceed 160 acres.

There is another amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The second amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is also proposed, at the end of the bill, after the word "purposes," to strike out the period and insert a semicolon and the following words:

The area so patented to not exceed 160 acres to any one organization at any station.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS, ETC., PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 2573) to amend section 198 of the act of March 4, 1909, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," as amended, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 8331) to amend the transportation act, 1920, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 1) providing that legislation dealing with pensions, private claims, distribution of war trophies, etc., be initiated by petition on suitable furnished forms was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The concurrent resolution will be passed over.

MEDICAL SOCIETY OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (S. 1591) to amend an act entitled "An act to revive, with amendments, an act to incorporate the Medical Society of the District of Columbia," approved July 7, 1838, as amended, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I make an inquiry of the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE]? As I understand, this organization was incorporated under a private charter. It has not availed itself of the general incorporation act of the District, and the Senator is of opinion that it may not amend its charter other than by act of Congress?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That was the opinion of the committee, and it is my opinion.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill. Let me say to the Senator, however, that we ought to amend the general incorporation act so that these corporations existing under private charters may avail themselves of the general statute, so that Congress will not be bothered in order to grant amendments to every little corporation that may exist under a privae charter.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I agree with the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the committee will be stated.

The amendment was, on page 2, line 2, to strike out "Sibert" and insert "Seibert," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to revive, with amendments, an act to incorporate the Medical Society of the District of Columbia," approved July 7, 1838 (6th Stats. at L., p. 741), as amended, be, and the same hereby is, amended so as to read as follows:

"That Drs. George Wythe Cook, William Gerry Morgan, John B. Nichols, William P. Carr, E. Y. Davidson, Philip S. Roy, A. L. Stavely, Henry C. Macatee, E. G. Seibert, J. Russell Verbrycke, jr., A. W. Boswell, Charles S. White, J. A. Gannon, D. S. Lamb, and Virgil B. Jackson, and such other persons as they may associate with themselves, and their successors, be, and they hereby are, constituted a body corporate of the District of Columbia, for the purpose of promoting and disseminating medical and surgical knowledge, and for no other purpose.

"SEC. 2. That the Medical Society of the District of Columbia be, and it is hereby, empowered to own, mortgage, and convey such property as may be necessary for its purposes, and to make such rules and regulations as it may require, and which may not be repugnant to the Constitution or laws of the United States.

"SEC. 3. That Congress may at any time alter, amend, or annul this act of incorporation of said society."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RESOLUTIONS PASSED OVER.

The resolution (S. Res. 77) creating a special committee to investigate the expenditures made in behalf of various propaganda and in the maintenance of lobbies in Washington was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, at the request of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] I ask that that resolution go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be passed over.

The resolution (S. Res. 170) referring the claims of R. S. Howard & Co., of New York City, and others, to the Court of Claims was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over until we can investigate it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be passed over.

AMENDMENT OF JUDICIAL CODE.

The bill (H. R. 6679) to amend section 108 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, was announced as next in order.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, all that that bill relates to is the transfer of one county in Texas from one judicial district to another. That is all there is in the bill, and there ought not to be any objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask that the bill be read.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not desire any further reading of the bill. I simply wanted to see the nature of it, and I ask unanimous consent that the further reading be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I ask that the report on the bill may be published in connection with the proceedings.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? There being no objection, it will be so ordered.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6679) to amend section 108 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with the recommendation that the bill do pass without amendment.

The following excerpt from the report of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House fully explains the object of the bill, which is purely local and of interest only to the people of Texas:

"This bill amends the existing law so as to transfer Pecos County, in the State of Texas, from the Del Rio division of the western judicial district of Texas to the El Paso division of the same judicial district in that State.

"Section 2 of the bill is new language, and provides in brief that all process against persons residing in Pecos County and are cognizable in the United States district court shall be issued out of and be made returnable to the court at Pecos City, and in addition thereto that all prosecutions against individuals for offenses that have been committed in that county shall be tried in the court at El Paso or Pecos City. The proviso contained in the second section is added so as to insure against the application of this section in any civil or criminal cause which was pending prior to the passage of this act.

"The bill will not entail any additional expenditure on the part of the Government, but will reduce expense by lessening the distance traveled in service of process, etc., and will be a great convenience to litigants and their attorneys resident in Pecos County."

BILLS, ETC., PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 2682) to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901," and the acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The resolution (S. Res. 172) declaring Truman H. Newberry to be a duly elected Senator from the State of Michigan was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let that go over. It is the subject of a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, these new measures just read by the Secretary do not seem to be upon any calendar that I have.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 748) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Charles F. Getchell was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1655) for the relief of Orin Thornton was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

EDITION OF CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES.

The resolution (S. Res. 151) providing for a reprint of the Constitution of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let that go over.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, just a moment.

When this matter was up before, at the request of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary I, representing the Committee on Rules, stated to the Senate that I had already directed clerks of the Committee on Rules to proceed to prepare a copy of the Constitution with the cases cited under each paragraph or article, and my clerk is working at that at this time. I do not need to employ an expert to assist him. If this resolution could be amended so as to put this work in the hands of the Committee on Rules and permit the committee to hire an assistant to this man whenever one is needed the committee could accomplish the work very much better, and the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary is perfectly willing that the amendments be made.

I will state that the man I have at work now has been at work some three or four weeks, and is getting along very nicely with the preparation of the work, and it will be a very valuable document for the Senators and also for anyone studying the Constitution.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator whether the suggestion made on the floor of the Senate before with reference to the notations, and so on, is going to be carried out?

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator means, by that, citing the case and quoting from the decision?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; the principal point decided in the case.

Mr. CURTIS. That is being done; and I might state that under one article my clerk has had to examine already some 500 pages to get out the decision.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I take it that the Senator is going to propose the amendments to which he refers?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator whether this will be printed as a part of the manual or as a separate document?

Mr. CURTIS. It is not to be printed as a part of the manual. It will be submitted as a separate document.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is all right.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. CURTIS. I offer the amendments which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be stated.

The amendments were, on line 7, before the word "Committee," to strike out "Judiciary" and insert "Rules"; and on line 8, after the word "to," to strike out "prepare" and insert "assist in preparing," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Constitution of the United States of America, including all amendments thereto and with citations of the cases of the Supreme Court of the United States construing its several provisions, collated under each separate provision, to date, be printed, and that 1,500 additional copies be printed for the use of the Senate. The Rules Committee is authorized to employ a competent person to assist in preparing the citations provided for, his compensation to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I desire to submit a question to the Senator from Kansas. Is it proposed that this document shall be printed in such form as will be convenient for distribution?

Mr. CURTIS. I will state to the Senator that when the matter was first proposed it was intended to print it as a part of the manual. If the substance of the decisions is given, it will make too large a volume. Therefore it is the intention of the committee to submit it so that it may be printed as a separate document.

Mr. WILLIS. That is desirable, I think.

Mr. CURTIS. That is the intention.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator no doubt has many requests from his constituents for copies of the Constitution. It ought not to be too voluminous. The average layman will get lost if there are a large number of citations. I think that is a good plan.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I think there is a good deal of merit in the last suggestion of the Senator from Ohio as to the depreciation of the value of this work by a mere mass citation of vast numbers of cases.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the old manual did that very thing. The object of this is not to cite a large number of cases, but to quote from the decisions of the principal cases and then cite below the cases that sustain that one or more decisions, from which quotations are made so as to give to the reader the decision of the court upon every article of the Constitution, so that one reading the decision will know at once what part of the article it applies to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. For instance, there may be a great many cases which contain mere obiter dicta in regard to the Constitution.

Mr. CURTIS. Those will be referred to merely by the citation and not quoted from.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the leading cases are cited and a few of the cases which follow them are given, it seems to me that would be sufficient. I am very glad, indeed, to hear the Senator from Kansas say that this new method of annotation is to be adopted, and in view of the fact that he is the chairman of the committee which has charge of the work, I urge him to take whatever steps may be required to see that the work is done in an efficient and able manner, otherwise its value will be practically nothing.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I intend to see that it is carefully and systematically done and that we get a work that is worth while.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The important part of it is that the annotations should be discriminating and should be accurate.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. In just a moment.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to indorse what the Senator has just said. When I was chairman of the Committee on Rules it had been the practice to set out a large number of citations, a number of which were valueless, and the Manual was so large that I instructed the clerk to leave off many of the citations, as they were of no value, anyway. The only satisfactory way to do that is as the chairman of the Committee on Rules has suggested.

Mr. CURTIS. May I make this suggestion: In order that the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary might be familiar with what was being done, and also that the Senator from Connecticut, who first made the suggestion as to this work, might know what was being done, I have had prepared the decisions under the preamble, and I ask the Senator from Minnesota if he is not perfectly satisfied that it is a good piece of work?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I have examined the work done by the clerk of the Senator from Kansas, and I find it altogether superior to anything we have attempted to do heretofore. It cites the leading cases bearing upon each particular section, gives a brief synopsis of the decisions, and then other cases which bear on it directly. I have examined the decisions which are referred to in the older editions of the Manual. There are a great many citations, and if Senators will get the old Manuals and examine them they will find that a great many of the citations are not germane; that they do not bear at all upon the clauses of the Constitution referred to.

The clerk will have to go over it and revise the whole thing. Having seen samples of his work, I am satisfied, from the way he has started in, that it will be a great work, and will eliminate a great many of the citations found in prior manuals

Mr. POINDEXTER. Whether or not the work will be useful will depend altogether upon whether it is accurate and discriminating.

Mr. CURTIS. It will not be submitted until I know it is accurate; I promise the Senator that.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I do not think this will meet the situation the Senator from Ohio has in mind. I understand that he thinks there is to be a print of the Constitution which can be gotten out among the people generally. This edition will only be really serviceable to lawyers who want to refer to the cases bearing upon the Constitution and who want to know what the cases decide. I think that is a good thing and all right, but I believe the Constitution should be printed without these notations. This will be a volume of considerable size. If it is to contain extracts from the various decisions of the courts; it will be quite a large volume, and we will not print any considerable number compared with the number of people in the country who may desire it. But after this edition is prepared, we can print the Constitution without the notations, if we deem it wise to distribute it. I think it would be a good thing to print a very large number of copies of the Constitution and distribute them.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, that is exactly the information I was trying to elicit. It is desirable that we shall have such a publication as the Senator from Washington has referred to, a rather comprehensive document, with citations, for the use of lawyers. Then there ought to be for quite general distribution a document that will bring the Constitution within the reach of everybody. I personally have a good many requests for copies of the Constitution, and there is no form now in which it can be sent out.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to say to the Senator that does not pertain to the work of this committee or of the clerk who is preparing the new edition. The question as to how many copies we will print or circulate is a matter which will come before the Committee on Printing, and they will determine that. The resolution simply relates to the work the clerk is doing, and the Committee on Printing will have to pass on the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

CODE OF LAW FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I ask that we go back to Senate bill 2682, to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901," and the acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto. After I have made a statement in regard to the bill, I do not think anybody will object to its consideration.

This is a bill to amend the law relating to the District of Columbia in relation to religious corporations, and the only amendment proposed is the insertion in that law of the words "or directors" after the word "trustees," so that it will be legal for one of these corporations to have directors instead of trustees. That is the only amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to recurring to Senate bill 2682?

Mr. KING. I have no objection; but why may we not pass a general law, so that these amendments may be made by the stockholders or the directors, as the case may be, and as by statute provided, the same as amendments to articles of incorporation are made in the States?

Mr. NELSON. This relates simply to the laws of the District of Columbia, to religious corporations, and the only amendment is that they be allowed to use the term "directors" as well as the term "trustees."

Mr. KING. The Senator has not quite answered my question. I suggest that we pass a general law, by the terms of which corporations may amend their own articles without coming to Congress for the right to amend. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901, and the acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, constituting the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, be, and the same are hereby, amended as follows: By inserting the words "or directors" after the word "trustees" wherever the word "trustees" occurs in sections 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, and 596.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COAL LANDS IN ALASKA.

The bill (S. 486) to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands in Alaska was announced as next in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

TRANSFER BY THE UNITED STATES OF LANDS IN ALABAMA.

The bill (S. 2124) to relinquish, release, remise, and quitclaim all right, title, and interest of the United States of America in and to all the lands contained within sections 17 and 20, township 3 south, range 1 west, St. Stephens meridian, Alabama, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States of America hereby forever relinquishes, releases, and quitclaims all right, title, and interest in and to all the lands now held under claim or color of title by individual or private ownership or municipal ownership and situated in the State of Alabama within the boundaries of sections 17 and 20, township 3 south, range 1 west, St. Stephens meridian, Alabama, whether or not patents issued therefor by the United States would be construed to include all the lands included within the boundaries of said sections.

The true intent of this act is hereby declared to be to concede and abandon all right, title, and interest of the United States to those persons, estates, firms, or corporations who would be the true and lawful owners of said lands under the laws of Alabama, including the laws of prescription, in the absence of said interest, title, and estate of the said United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AUGUSTUS S. PEABODY.

The bill (H. R. 3250) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to convey to August S. Peabody certain land in Galveston County, Tex., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I would like to have an explanation of that bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I shall be glad to state to the Senator from Georgia and to the other Senators the meaning of the bill.

In 1906 the United States Government obtained for lighthouse purposes certain lands from what was known as the Texas City Co. Afterwards a hurricane destroyed the lighthouses, and the Government reestablished them on other lands. This bill is to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to retransfer the lands to the legal successor of the parties who first deeded the lands. They practically donated them, the consideration being $1. So I think the bill will not be objected to.

Mr. KING. Did the occupation by the Government enhance the value of the premises?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Nothing was left after the hurricane destroyed the lighthouses but the bare land.

Mr. KING. So that the Government would lose nothing by the passage of this measure?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Government would lose nothing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys with amendments, on page 1, line 4, after the word "convey," to insert the words "by quitclaim deed," and on the same line to strike out the word "August" and to insert the word "Augustus," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, authorized to convey by quitclaim deed to Augustus S. Peabody, of Chicago, Cook County, Ill., grantee of all rights, title, and interest of the Texas City Co., all the following-described tracts or parcels of land in Galveston County, Tex., known, designated, and described as follows, to wit: Being a part of lot No. 9, in block No. 47, first division of the town of Texas City, Galveston County, Tex., and beginning at the southwest corner of said lot No. 9; thence north along the west line of said lot 47 feet to a corner; thence east at right angle 25 feet; thence south along the east line of said lot 47 feet; thence west with the south line of said lot 25 feet to the place of beginning. Also, that certain tract or parcel of land, being a square 15 feet, and being a part of Bay Street, in the town of Texas City, Galveston County, Tex., and beginning at a point 62 feet east of the east line of block 9, first division of said town of Texas City, and 78 feet north of the southeast corner of said block 9; thence north 15 feet; thence east 15 feet; thence south 15 feet; thence west 15 feet to the place of beginning; all of which tracts or parcels of land were granted and conveyed to the United States by the Texas City Co. in May, 1906, for the nominal consideration of $1 for each tract, and which land was to be used as site for beacons or ranges to mark the Texas City Channel; said tracts of land being no longer needed for the purposes for which they were conveyed, in view of the abandonment of said beacons or ranges formerly established or intended for use upon such tracts: Provided, That such conveyance shall be made without expense to either party, except that the said Augustus S. Peabody shall pay a consideration of $2 and such expenses as are incident to the preparation and recording of the necessary title papers for the purpose of obtaining title to the said tracts and sites upon which beacons or shore ranges were established.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in:

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

DESERT-LAND CLAIMANTS.

The bill (H. R. 7161) to authorize certain desert-land claimants who entered the military or naval service of the United States during the war with Germany to make final proof of their entries was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of March 1, 1921 (41 Stat., p. 1202), entitled "An act to authorize certain homestead settlers or entrymen who entered the military or naval service of the United States during the war with Germany to make final proof of their entries," be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto at the end thereof the following matter, which shall be known and designated as section 2 of said act:

"SEC. 2. That any entryman under the desert land laws, or any person entitled to preference right of entry under section 1 of the act approved March 28, 1908 (35 Stat. L., p. 52), who after application or entry for surveyed lands or legal initiation of claim for unsurveyed lands, and prior to November 11, 1918, enlisted or was actually engaged in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps during the war with Germany, who has been honorably discharged and because of physical incapacities due to service is unable to accomplish reclamation of and payment for the land, may make proof without further reclamation thereof or payments thereon under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and receive patent for the land by him so entered or claimed, if found entitled thereto: Provided, That no such patent shall issue prior to the survey of the land."

Mr. KING. May I inquire of any member of the committee what modification the bill makes in existing law? Does the Senator from Montana know whether it modifies existing law; and if so, to what extent, with respect to the character of proof to be submitted in order to obtain title?

Mr. MYERS. I can not fully answer that question. It is a House bill, and I did not report it from the committee. I was present at the committee meeting when the bill was ordered reported out, and the information given there was that it affects very few people. The bill gives substantial justice, and provides that these men may have the same treatment that is given other entrymen on public lands. I think it is a good bill, but I can not give the information which the Senator asks.

Mr. KING. If it extends to them the same right, gives the same treatment, in the words of the Senator, accorded others, of course it is proper, and we ought to pass it. May I inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin whether he is familiar with the terms of this measure?

Mr. LENROOT. In a general way. I remember the bill being up in the committee, and while I do not remember the details, I was satisfied at the time.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MOUNT M'KINLEY NATIONAL PARK, ALASKA.

The bill (H. R. 6262) to add certain lands to Mount McKinley National Park, Alaska, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. This bill passed the House. I have a great deal of confidence in the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who reported the bill; yet we have nothing in our files to indicate how much of the land there is, or the reason for the passage of the bill.

Mr. CURTIS. Let it go over, then.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

CLEARWATER, ST. JOE, AND SELWAY NATIONAL FORESTS.

The bill (H. R. 77) for the consolidation of forest lands within the Clearwater, St. Joe, and Selway National Forests was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That bill is subject to the same objection. I do not know why we have not reports on these bills in our files, but they are not there.

Mr. KING. A number of these bills have just been reported. We do not have the advantage of any written report with respect to many of them, and it seems to me we ought not to consider them at this time, but should have an opportunity to examine the bills or familiarize ourselves with the reports which have been submitted in the House, if none have been submitted in the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I have been advised that the Public Printer has been unable to comply with the requirements of supplying the reports on these bills. If Senators wish to let them go over until the reports are here, I think that had better be done.

Mr. KING. I suggest that they go over until the reports are submitted.

Mr. CURTIS. Does that apply to all the balance of the bills on the calendar?

Mr. KING. Yes; I make that request as to all of them.

Mr. MYERS. There are two bills of that character on the calendar that were reported by me, and I am ready to explain them.

Mr. KING. I will exempt those two bills from my general request.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I would like also to have an exception as to the last one, reported by my colleague, because I know he is familiar with the facts, as we both are.

Mr. POINDEXTER. As to the next to the last one also, I can give an explanation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair suggests that the bills be taken up in their order.

FIRST INTERNATIONAL BANK OF SWEETGRASS, MONT.

The bill (S. 2004) for the relief of the First International Bank of Sweetgrass, Mont., was announced as next in order.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Let the bill go over.

Mr. MYERS. I would like to have the Senator withhold his objection for a moment until I may make an explanation of the bill.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. MYERS. The fact of the matter is that Stephen Horgasz was a homesteader in Montana and was drafted into the United States Army during the war with Germany. He claimed his exemption on the ground that he was not a citizen of the United States, and swore that he was not, and that went into the records of the War Department. It seems that he was exempted on that ground. Later he came to make final proof on this homestead and he either swore that he was a citizen of the United States or produced evidence that he was, and that evidence was satisfactory to the register and receiver of the land office. The final proof was regular in every way on its face, and a receiver's receipt was issued for his final payment for the final proof.

A receiver's receipt is considered universally as evidence of title and, with very few exceptions, is always followed by the issuance of a patent in a very short time. People who have dealings with the holder of a receiver's receipt uniformly regard it as evidence of title. After getting this receiver's receipt, Horgasz went to this bank and mortgaged the land, which he had a right to do under the law, and borrowed $2,000 on it. I believe it is 640 acres under the homestead grazing act. He executed the mortgage which the bank holds, and he got the money.

Later in some way somebody informed the Interior Department—I believe somebody contested his right to a patent—of the fact that he had sworn when he was drafted that he was not a citizen of the United States. The matter was investigated and it was found that he had made his declaration of intention to become a citizen and had lived here long enough but had never taken out his final citizenship papers; had never obtained his certificate of citizenship. On that ground the Secretary of the Interior refused to issue the patent. The money was borrowed from the bank without any laches or fault or neglect on the part of the bank. The proceeding was regular on its face. I believe in the meantime Horgasz abandoned the land. He simply got the money and then abandoned the land.

The bill merely provides that patent may issue to the bank instead of to Horgasz, upon the bank paying to the United States Government the value of the land, but not under any circumstances less than $1.25 an acre, the amount required to be paid for the land if commutation were made. That is all that Horgasz would have been required to pay and it is all that the Government requires of anyone commuting a homestead entry. These are the facts, and on these facts and this showing the committee recommended the passage of the bill.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. As I understand the Senator there is no appropriation in behalf of the bank?

Mr. MYERS. None whatever. The bank must pay the United States at least $1.25 an acre for the land.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The bank gets the land and thereby collects its bill?

Mr. MYERS. Yes; if it can. These are the facts. The bill is recommended in a substitute form by the Secretary of the Interior. The Secretary of the Interior sent in an amendment in the nature of a substitute, thinking it fitted the facts better and served justice better. The Secretary unqualifiedly recommends the passage of the bill in that form, and it is so reported.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I withdraw my objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to issue patent to the First International Bank of Sweetgrass, Mont., for the south half of section 25, township 37 north, range 5 west, Montana principal meridian, upon payment by said bank of the value of said land, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, less any amounts loaned by said bank to Stephen Horgasz and remaining unpaid: Provided, That in no event shall patent so issue to said bank for said land except upon the payment therefor by said bank at the rate of not less than $1.25 per acre.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN CESTNIK, JR.

The bill (H. R. 5511) for the relief of John Cestnik, jr., was considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Northern Pacific Railway Co., upon its filing with the Secretary of the Interior a proper relinquishment disclaiming in favor of the United States all title and interest in or to the south half of the southwest quarter, section 11, township 8 south, range 20 east, in the Bozeman, Mont., land district, under its mineral indemnity selection, list No. 146, embracing said tract, shall be entitled to select and receive a patent for other vacant unreserved nonmineral public lands of an equal area in that State; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to permit, after the filing of such relinquishment by said railway company, the homestead entry of John Cestnik, jr., to remain intact as though said entry had been properly allowed, the same to remain subject to compliance with the laws governing entries of like character.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I am prepared to make an explanation of the bill if anyone wishes it. This is a bill to authorize the Northern Pacific Railway Co. to relinquish its title to a piece of land in Montana and to select another piece of land of like character and value somewhere else in the State of Montana if it is so disposed. It is a bill which passed the House.

It seems that John Cestnik entered a piece of Government land and in some way or other, through some fault of some official of the Government, he was informed and led to believe that the land was all Government land subject to entry. His application was received and he was permitted to enter the land. He lived on it the required length of time and put valuable improvements on it and spent time and money on it. When it came to final proof it developed upon further investigation that title to a part of the land, some subdivision of it, is vested in the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. as railroad land. The bill is simply to authorize the railroad company, if it shall see fit, to relinquish its claim to that 40 acres, as I believe it is, and select other land elsewhere if it be so disposed. There is nothing compulsory. It is merely to enable the railroad company to do it, and the way the railroad company proposed to do it was to fix up the matter with the entryman, John Cestnik, agreeably to both, and then the entryman will get his land and the railroad may select 40 acres of land somewhere else.

That is the object of the bill and all that it provides. I think it is a very just bill, both to the railroad company and to the entryman, as well as to the Government. There is nothing compulsory about it. It is simply left to the discretion of the railroad company.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MINIDOKA NATIONAL FOREST.

The bill (H. R. 2914) to add certain lands to Minidoka National Forest was announced as next in order.

Mr. CURTIS. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

SHOSHONE NATIONAL FOREST.

The bill (H. R. 2205) to add certain lands on the North Fork of the Shoshone River to the Shoshone National Forest was announced as next in order.

Mr. CURTIS. Let the bill go over.

Mr. KENDRICK. I ask the Senator who objected to withhold his objection until I can make an explanation of the bill.

Mr. CURTIS. I am glad to withdraw my objection. I objected because there was an understanding that as no reports are in our files on these bills they should be passed over unless some one was present to explain. I did not know the Senator could explain it. I gladly withdraw the objection for an explanation.

Mr. KENDRICK. I think the best explanation would be to read from the report, which states that—

The proposed legislation would add four and one-half sections of land, or approximately 2,880 acres, to the Shoshone National Forest. The land in question was originally within the boundaries of the Yellowstone Park Timber Land Reservation, created by proclamation of the President on March 30, 1891. Due to the fact that the region was unsurveyed when the present boundary of the Shoshone National Forest was established it was thought that it would follow the line of the old Yellowstone Park timber land reserve, but on projecting the lines of survey a line was established which resulted in leaving out of the present national forest the particular lands in question. They are of the same general character as the adjoining national forest lands. They are rough, rugged, and generally unsuited for agricultural use. At the same time they are of very great importance in connection with the administration of the Shoshone National Forest, for which they form a natural gateway. They include two great buttes which rise on each side of the roadway at the proposed boundary line and form a landmark which is known throughout that region as the beginning of the national forest. This area also controls important camp grounds on the road to the east entrance to the Yellowstone National Park. The lands in question are already under presidential withdrawal in aid of this measure.

The lands involved are practically of the same character as those which are included in the park, and it is also of very great administrative advantage to have those lands included.

Mr. CURTIS. I have read the letter of the Acting Secretary and so far as I am concerned I have no objection.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming how much will be involved in the purchase of those lands?

Mr KENDRICK. There are 2,880 acres of mountain territory that is of the same character as included in the withdrawal for the forest reserve. In fact, it was believed when the forest reserve was created that it included this land, but due to the absence of an official survey the land was left out. It made a jog in the boundaries adding to the cost and making more difficult the administration of the forest.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. It is Government land?

Mr. KENDRICK. Yes; all of it.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following-described lands are hereby added to the Shoshone National Forest, Wyo., and made subject to all laws applicable to national forests: West half of section 17, all of sections 18 and 19, west half of section 20, west half of section 29, all of section 30, township 52 north, range 105 west, all of the sixth principal meridian, Wyoming.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

G. FRED ROACH AND OTHERS.

The bill (H. R. 7780) for the relief of G. Fred Roach and others was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That G. Fred Roach, who made desert-land entry Salt Lake City serial 016552 for the east half southeast quarter, southwest quarter southeast quarter, southeast quarter southwest quarter, and the west half southwest quarter of section 13, and the east half southeast quarter section 14, township 21 south, range 5 west, Salt Lake meridian; Grant H. Geddes, assignee of Richard S. Webber, who made desert-land entry Salt Lake City serial 016516 for the north half section 24, township 21 south, range 5 west, Salt Lake meridian; A. William Malone, who made desert-land entry Salt Lake serial 016517 for the south half section 24, township 21 south, range 5 west, Salt Lake meridian; and Mabel S. Roach, who made desert-land entry Salt Lake City serial 016553 for the northeast quarter, east half northwest quarter, and northeast quarter southwest quarter section 25, township 21 south, range 5 west, Salt Lake meridian, all of which entries were allowed on April 6, 1916, be, and they are hereby, authorized to complete title to the lands embraced in their respective entries upon the payment of any balance unpaid of the sum of $1.25 per acre for the lands so entered to the receiver of the United States land office at Salt Lake City, Utah, within 90 days from the approval of this act.

Mr. LADD. Mr. President, I wish to make a very brief explanation with reference to the bill. G. Fred Roach and three other parties filed at Salt Lake City in 1916. The war came on and they were unable to complete the holdings filed on and entered the war service. The bill is for the purpose of extending and giving them the privilege of completing their ownership to the land by the payment, within 90 days, of the balance due.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TENDERFOOT LAKE, WIS.

The bill (S. 2468) providing for the sale and disposal of public lands within the area heretofore surveyed as Tenderfoot Lake, State of Wisconsin, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on the survey of any public lands found to exist within the area heretofore surveyed as Tenderfoot Lake, in sections 7, 8, 17, and 18, township 43 north, range 8 east, fourth principal meridian, in the State of Wisconsin, the owners of adjacent lands shall have a preference right to purchase such lands so surveyed for a period of 60 days after the filing of the official plats of such surveys at $1.25 per acre: Provided, That such privilege shall not extend to any lands so surveyed inuring to the State of Wisconsin under the act of September 28, 1850 (9 Stats., p. 519): Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall have the effect of defeating the rights of any other person or persons which may have attached to such lands or any part thereof.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make all necessary rules and regulations to carry this act into effect.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin be kind enough to explain the purpose of the bill?

Mr. LENROOT. This is a bill made necessary by an erroneous survey of lands fronting upon Tenderfoot Lake, a small lake in Wisconsin. The survey showed a meander line from the lake, but it was afterwards discovered, and only two or three years ago, that an error was made, and there are three tracts fringing the lake that are not included in the survey and which the adjacent owners for more than 40 years had supposed they owned. The bill merely provides that the adjacent owners of a very small fraction in each case shall be permitted to buy from the Government at $1.25 an acre what for more than 40 years it was supposed they already owned and was included in the original Government grant. There are only 300 acres involved altogether.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I would like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin whether there are any conflicting or adverse claims by other private parties?

Mr. LENROOT. None at all.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SEARCY HOSPITAL FOR THE COLORED INSANE, ALABAMA.

The bill (H. R. 6961) granting certain lands to the State of Alabama for the use of the Searcy Hospital for the Colored Insane was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following-described lands contiguous to the Searcy Hospital for the Colored Insane, to wit, all of fractional section 1, township 1 north, range 1 west, St. Stephen's meridian, south of Cedar Creek and west of John Chastang's private land grant, containing 181.41 acres, be, and the same are hereby, granted to the State of Alabama for the use of the said hospital, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to issue a patent to said State for the same: Provided, That the said State shall not have the right to sell or convey the lands herein granted, or any part thereof, or to devote the same to any other purpose than as hereinbefore described, and in the event of attempted alienation or failure to use said lands for the purposes hereinbefore described the same shall revert to the United States.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, this bill was introduced in the House by Representative McDUFFIE, of the district in which this land and hospital are located. A similar bill was introduced here by my colleague, Senator UNDERWOOD. This is the McDuffie bill which passed the House. It was favorably reported by the Senate Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, and I am anxious to have it pass the Senate to-day. We have a hospital located in Mobile County, Ala., known as the Searcy Hospital for the Colored Insane, and the 181 acres of land here donated or granted for the use and benefit of the afflicted inmates of that institution are necessary to its successful operation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Alabama if the hospital is a State institution?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; it is a State institution. I ask for a vote.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MIKE CAMPBELL.

The bill (H. R. 3116) validating the homestead entry of Mike Campbell for certain public land in Alaska was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the entry hereinafter described be, and the same is hereby, validated and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to issue patent thereon upon the submission of satisfactory proof of compliance with the provisions of the act of June 6, 1912 (37 Stat., p. 123):

Homestead entry, Juneau, Alaska, No. 03986, made by Mike Campbell on July 14, 1919, for the west half of the northwest quarter, the northeast quarter of the northwest quarter, and the northwest quarter of the northeast quarter, section 6, township 13 north, range 4 west, Seward meridian, and in lieu of that tract the Territory of Alaska shall have the right to select equal area of public land of the character subject to selection under its school land grant.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, having reported this bill, and having been requested to make an explanation of it, I will say that the beneficiary of the bill, Mr. Campbell, originated the claim by the purchase of improvements upon the land in question when it was a part of the Chugach National Forest. Under the law applying to Alaska he had the right to ask that the particular land upon which he located be listed and that he be permitted to file a homestead entry upon it. The forest ranger, however, upon the report of the department, told Mr. Campbell that this land would shortly be eliminated from the national forest, and that he had better wait to apply until the survey was made and that he could apply under the general land laws. This Mr. Campbell did. He did not make his filing when he could have done so while it was a part of the national forest. After the survey was made it so happened that this particular land fell in section 36, which was a school section donated to the Territory of Alaska. All this bill proposes to do is to validate his entry and to permit the Territory to select additional lands to make up its loss by reason of its being within the school section. If it was not for the fact that it was in section 36, Mr. Campbell could complete his entry. The bill is favorably recommended by the department.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 726) for the relief of George Emerson was announced as next in order.

Mr. CURTIS. Let that bill go over, Mr. President.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I should like to make an explanation of the bill if the Senator from Kansas will withdraw his objection for a moment. I will frankly state all of the facts connected with the bill, so far as I know them.

Mr. CURTIS. I have asked that the bill go over at the request of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. MYERS. If that is the case——

Mr. CURTIS. The Senate will meet to-morrow, and I suggest that the bill go over until then.

Mr. MYERS. Very well.

The bill (S. 1452) providing for establishing shooting grounds for the public, for establishing game refuges and breeding grounds, for protecting migratory birds, and requiring a Federal license to hunt them was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, that bill was reported only yesterday. It is an important measure; I am inclined to think I shall be in favor of it, but——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have the report on the bill here, I will say to my colleague.

Mr. JONES of Washington. However, I should like to have an opportunity to look the bill over a little.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will say to the senior Senator from Washington that I am inclined to favor the bill, but I should like to examine it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

LANDS IN RAINIER NATIONAL FOREST.

The bill (H. R. 6864) authorizing exchanges of lands within the Rainier National Forest, in the State of Washington, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized in his discretion to accept on behalf of the United States title to any lands not in Government ownership within the Rainier National Forest if, in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture, such lands are chiefly valuable for national-forest purposes, and in exchange therefor may issue patent for not to exceed an equal value of Government land within any national forest within the State of Washington, or the Secretary of Agriculture may permit the grantor to cut and remove an equal value of national-forest timber in any national forest in the State of Washington, the values in each instance to be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture and to be acceptable to the owner as fair compensation. Timber given in such exchanges shall be cut and removed under the direction and supervision and in accordance with the requirements of the Secretary of Agriculture. Lands conveyed to the United States under this act shall, upon acceptance of title, become parts of the Rainier National Forest.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, that bill seems to involve a very important matter. I wish the Senator from Washington would explain the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, although my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] reported the measure, I will say that we have passed through the Senate several bills similar in character with reference to various national parks in the different States. The situation in the State of Washington is just this: There are logging operations going on near the boundaries of this park. There are certain tracts of very valuable timber of a very fine character within the limits of the national park owned by private parties. They have delayed logging the timber for quite awhile upon assurances from us that such legislation would be passed as would enable the Forest Service to allow them to exchange these lands for other lands of a similar character, not exceeding in value the lands involved in this bill, somewhere else in some other forest reserve. The bill is for the purpose of preserving these forest lands.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I am somewhat of a crank about preserving trees, and I am in hearty sympathy with the object of the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The bill is for that purpose.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HAROLD KERNAN.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President——

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Louisiana desires to make a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I ask unanimous consent to recur to Order of Business 183, being the bill (S. 405) for the relief of Harold Kernan. I will state that I am not the author of the bill.

Mr. CURTIS. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the accounting officers of the Treasury Department are hereby authorized and directed to credit the account of Harold Kernan, now serving as first lieutenant, Thirteenth Field Artillery, United States Army, in the sum of $3,426, with which said officer was charged for money stolen from an enlisted man serving under him, for which said officer was held responsible while stationed at the city of Brest, France, in October, 1919.

Mr. KING. I made objection to the consideration of that measure, but I withhold it pending the explanation of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I did not introduce this bill, but as a member of the Committee on Claims, I reported it from that committee to the Senate. The bill has been pending here for some time. It involves purely a question of discretion and judgment on the part of the officer whose account has been charged with the amount of $3,426 because of the loss of that sum while it was being transported from the sales branch, depot quartermaster's office, to the finance office at Brest, France. The facts in the case disclose that Lieut. Harold Kernan, of the Thirteenth Field Artillery, United States Army, was in charge of this sales branch. He succeeded some other Army officer who had established the precedent of transferring the money by sending it in the hands of one of the soldiers from the sales branch to the finance office, which was not a great distance away. The money was sent early in the afternoon, and, of course, in the daytime. The soldier had been in the habit of carrying the money, and the practice had been established before Lieut. Kernan was appointed to take charge of the sales branch. On that afternoon the soldier who was carrying the money was sandbagged on the streets of Brest and the money was taken away from him. The matter was reported to the proper authorities, but naturally the board which investigated the case, having no authority to appropriate funds, could not extend relief. The Secretary of War, however, on January 20, 1921, reviewing the proceedings had in the case finally concluded to recommend that Lieut. Kernan be relieved by crediting his accounts with the sum of $3,426, which had been charged against him.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Yes.

Mr. KING. Did not the Senator inadvertently rather inaccurately state the facts? As I recall the circumstances from the discussion which occurred here several months ago, the board found that the officer was culpable; that he was negligent in having failed to provide a proper guard. They did not base their final decision upon their lack of authority to exonerate the officer, but they positively found that he was guilty of negligence because he did not provide a sufficient guard to protect the employee of the Government who was carrying the money.

Mr. BROUSSARD. The Senator is entirely correct in that. What I meant to say was that the board, whether they found that he was guilty of any negligence or not, had no authority to make any appropriation or to issue any order crediting the accounts of Lieut. Kernan with the amount which had been charged against him. As I understand the proceedings, the board——

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, the Senator can see that it would have been wholly illogical and inconsistent for them to have found that he was guilty of neglect and then at the same time order that he be credited with the amount.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I understand; but immediately upon this amount being taken he was charged with the amount which had been stolen, and no board could have done away with that charge. That is my understanding at any rate.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Is it not a fact that this officer took no precautions at all, as is usual, in transferring money from one place to another?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I will state to the Senator from Georgia that the evidence shows that when this officer was appointed and assumed the duties of the office he inquired what the custom was in regard to transferring the funds, and he followed the practice which had prevailed. The money was given to a soldier to be carried a few blocks away through the streets at, I think, about 3 o'clock in the afternoon. The streets were not deserted; there were people all along there. The precedent of transmitting the funds in that way had been established by his predecessor.

Mr. ROBINSON. Was it customary to send a guard with the soldier carrying the funds?

Mr. BROUSSARD. It was not.

Mr. ROBINSON. That custom had been established prior to the incumbency of the officer who is charged with the default?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Yes; it so appears from the recommendation of the Secretary of War and from the evidence furnished before the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ROBINSON. Was any question raised as to good faith? Did anyone claim that there could have been collusion or that there probably was collusion?

Mr. BROUSSARD. There was no question of that kind raised at all.

Mr. ROBINSON. The honesty of the officer is not assailed in any way?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Not in any manner.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think under those circumstances the bill ought to be passed.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I hope the Senator from Utah will not urge his objection to the bill. A lieutenant in the Army receives a very small salary. This officer, I repeat, merely followed the precedent which had been established by his predecessor, and yet his account is charged with $3,426, which is nearly two years' salary. The Secretary of War at the time recommended that this relief be extended, and I hope that the Senate will pass the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not object to the consideration of the bill, but I am afraid that the passage of the bill will be a rather unfortunate precedent. The Senator knows that large numbers of men are charged with the custody of Government funds in the Post Office, in the Army, in the Shipping Board, and in the multitudinous activities in which the Government is engaged. I think that every possible effort should be made to impress upon officers charged with the custody of public funds that they must guard them and protect them. We have in a number of instances appropriated money to postmasters where they alleged that the safes have been robbed, when they knew that the doors of the safes were not secured. They acted in good faith, in that they did not think that any person would invade the post office and attempt to rob it. We are letting down the bars and excusing men from taking what I conceive to be necessary and proper steps to protect Government property intrusted to their care.

I suggest to the Senator that if we pass this bill, it will be a bad precedent. It will be notice to Government employees that they need not think for themselves; that if they follow some old, outworn precedent or method or practice in dealing with Government funds, regardless of changed conditions, and the Government loses the funds intrusted to their care through robbery or through the misfeasance of some subordinate, the Government will come to their relief and exonerate them. Such a precedent will be bad. If, upon the other hand, the Government were to be rigid and exacting, while in some instances perhaps it would be rather severe punishment for the officials who had been intrusted with money to be called upon to pay it back, in the long run it would make for efficiency, for proper administration, and would save the Government large sums of money.

I shall not object to the consideration of the bill. I shall vote against it, however, as I think the precedent is very bad, and I do not think the Senate ought to go on record in favor of this measure.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, in connection with the statement of the position of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], I think it pertinent to bring to the attention of the Senate the report of the Secretary of War on this bill. In my opinion it fully justifies the statement of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD].

The Secretary of War, among other things, says:

> It appears, however, that since the transfer took place in the middle of the afternoon and the route followed was along frequented streets, the failure to provide more adequate protection was due to an error in judgment which might have been committed by anyone similarly placed. This view is also justified by the fact that Capt. Kernan's predecessor had, so far as the papers disclose, followed the same procedure in the daily transfer of these funds. I feel, therefore, that the ends of justice will be served by granting the relief contemplated.

Mr. President, if it should be made to appear that the officer in charge of these funds was under direct orders from a superior to supply a guard, he would be, of course, deprived of discretion in the matter; but the circumstances indicate, if they do not clearly establish, that a mere question of discretion was involved.

The distance was very short. The route was along a way that was frequented, and one could hardly anticipate that the messenger would be intercepted and assaulted and robbed.

Under those circumstances, I think it would be a very great injustice to this young officer to compel him to bear the responsibility for this robbery. Congress has passed a great many bills relieving civilians, postmasters, and others of that type, which in my judgment were not nearly so strongly entrenched in facts of justification as this case.

Under the circumstances, I join in the hope of the Senator from Louisiana that the bill will pass.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, just one word, in view of what my good friend from Arkansas has said.

There is one part of the report which I had not read and which has just come to my attention. It appears that an examination was held immediately after the robbery, and I want to read from the report of the board. It was composed of Maj. Lathe B. Row, who was the president, Capt. F. T. Burt, and First Lieut. W. D. Powell, recorder; and this report was approved by L. E. Scherer, colonel, Cavalry, United States Army, commanding.

Briefly, this report states as follows:

> About 3 p. m. on October 7, 1919, Capt. Harold Kernan, F. A., in charge of sales branch, depot No. 1, base section No. 5, Brest, France, intrusted to Pvt. Guy L. Bolton, Quartermaster Corps, detachment No. 500, the sum of $3,426, property of the United States, for which the said Capt. Kernan was responsible, and directed Pvt. Bolton to deposit this money at the base finance office. That shortly after 3 p. m. Pvt.

Bolton, while passing through an alley in the city of Brest, on his way to the finance office, was struck by a person or persons unknown, rendered unconscious, and while unconscious was robbed of the sum of $3,426 aforementioned.

The board further finds that Capt. Harold Kernan, Field Artillery, did not exercise reasonable prudence and care in intrusting the sum of $3,426 to Pvt. Bolton for deposit at the finance office. This conclusion is based on the fact that it is well known that the city of Brest is infested with lawless characters and that an individual traveling alone, especially an American soldier, is very apt to become involved in difficulties which would be likely to result in the loss of any considerable sum of money which he might have in his possession, and that under these circumstances, Capt. Kernan should have provided at least one other man as an escort for the bearer of these funds. It appears from the evidence that the practice of sending funds to the finance office by a soldier messenger, from the sales branch of depot No. 1, was inherited by Capt. Kernan's predecessor. It also appears that the robbery took place in broad daylight in a portion of the city of Brest somewhat frequented by passersby. These facts, however, do not constitute sufficient justification of Capt. Kernan's method in sending the funds in question to the finance office.

The board therefore is of the opinion that the loss of funds above mentioned was due to neglect on the part of Capt. Kernan to properly safeguard these funds while in transit to the finance office, and therefore recommends that Capt. Kernan be required, under the Eighty-third Article of War, to make good the loss of $3,426, the property of the United States.

There being no further business before it, the board then, at 4 p. m., adjourned sine die.

Then follow the names of those constituting the board, and the approval by the Cavalry officer.

Mr. President, it appears that immediately after this money was purloined or taken by force from the private, a board was convened to make an investigation. They were on the ground. Undoubtedly the officers composing the board would sympathize with a brother officer, and if they could have found honorably, under their oaths of office, any excuse for his conduct, any justification to relieve him from responsibility, it is fair to assume that they would have so found. It seems to me that we are discrediting the officers; we are going behind findings which they made when the evidence was before them, after a full and complete investigation; and in the teeth of their findings that the officer was at fault we propose to relieve him and to make the appropriation.

I make no objection to the consideration of the bill, but, I repeat, I shall vote against it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, is there nothing before the Senate?

Mr. CURTIS. It was the intention to have an executive session, but I understood the Senator wanted to take a few minutes to address the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. I wanted to inquire about the railroad funding bill. I do not see the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce in the Senate at this time.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. And hardly anyone else.

Mr. HARRISON. And hardly anyone else, as suggested by the Senator from Georgia. It may be that the information I seek can be given by the Senator from Kansas, or some other Senator on the other side.

My inquiry is this: The President some time ago submitted to the Congress a request, a very urgent request, to pass the railroad funding bill. The bill passed the House and was reported out of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce. I think it is a very iniquitous measure, but some weeks ago the chairman of the committee expressed himself very strongly to the effect that he wanted the bill passed, and he set it aside at the very urgent request of the leadership on the other side, to permit the Newberry case to be taken up. Senators on the other side thought that perhaps they could rush the Newberry case through in a couple of days, and so, after some solicitation, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] yielded, but in yielding he said that if the Newberry case took very long he would insist on taking up the railroad funding bill, again making it the unfinished business, and having it passed.

Just before we adjourned, 10 days ago, the Senator from Iowa stated that at the very first opportunity when Congress reconvened in December he would call up the railroad funding bill and press it for consideration. We have been in session three days, and while I have seen the Senator from Iowa on the floor, and nothing apparently of importance before the Senate, I have not heard anything of the railroad funding bill. If the Senator from Iowa or the Senator from Kansas will take us and the country into their confidence and enlighten us as to whether there has been a shift in the plans, we shall be very glad to know about it, and if there is any reason why the railroad funding bill is not as important and pressing for solution now as it was some weeks ago and a few days ago, when, because it was delayed a few days, there was talk of invoking cloture to press it through the Senate, we would like to know it; so if the Senator from Kansas will oblige me by answering the question I shall be glad to have him do so.

Mr. CURTIS. I am not a member of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and I have no authority to speak for the chairman, but I understand the bill has been laid aside because of the fact that it is easy now to secure money, and the securities have been disposed of, or are being disposed of satisfactorily in the market.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then the Senator does not understand that the bill will be again brought before the Senate?

Mr. CURTIS. I could not say as to that. I should judge not.

Mr. HARRISON. It is about that that I desire to address the Senate briefly. It pains some of us to see this Congress starting out so inauspiciously. We had hoped that in the very beginning there would be a set program laid out, and that it would be rushed to completion. Of course, we may differ about these measures, but the country is entitled to know, and certainly the minority in the Senate is entitled to know, what bills are coming up, when they are coming up, and when they are going to be abandoned.

We had a good deal of such abandonment of measures in the last Congress. And that is one of the reasons why the Congress is in such disrepute. One day we would see reported out of one of the committees a bill that was urged as being important, and upon which it was said the prosperity and industrial activities of the country were dependent, and then in a day or two those in charge of it would see the light—realize their mistake—change front, and the bill would be withdrawn or recommitted to the committee. I know the soldiers' bonus bill, for instance, is fresh in the memory of Senators here. After the chairman of the Committee on Finance had heralded the importance of that legislation and in eloquent terms pictured the duty of Congress to do something for those who fought to preserve our institutions and add new glory to our country, they brought it out of the committee. We debated it a few weeks, and finally the President of the United States sent word to Senators on the other side to retreat, and they retreated.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I beg to remind my friend, the Senator from Mississippi, that the President came in person, made a speech on the negative side of the case, and killed the soldiers' bonus bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; the first time in the history of the American Government that such a practice was attempted. But the President had changed his mind. Not for the first time in his career had he done that, because he told the soldiers as a candidate he was in favor of some legislation in their behalf. As a Senator he had spoken against Executive interference. He had held President Wilson up to scorn as being a dictator and an autocrat, forcing legislation through Congress, and he condemned his activities in that regard in the strongest terms and with the greatest eloquence he could employ. But he had forgotten all that, and came in person and asked the Congress to defeat legislation which they had promised the soldiers they would pass, and Senators retreated overnight, so that legislation died.

But that was not the only time he had changed front. We heard much about the reduction of taxes during the campaign and the need of the revision of our tax laws and of the lifting of the burden from the backs of those least able to bear them. Yet in the last Congress, just as the bill was about to be voted on, again he wrote a letter to the Congress and told them what he desired them to do, namely, to reduce the maximum surtax on large incomes from 50 per cent to 40 per cent. But the House of Representatives had independence, they had courage, they had doubtless read the speeches of the President when he was Senator against presidential encroachment, and they told him "where to get off"; they scorned his letter and repudiated his suggestion. They stood like true representatives of the people and ignored his request, and accepted the amendment that was put on the tax bill in the Senate by Democratic and progressive Republican votes.

It was due to the action of a few patriotic, courageous, lion-hearted Republicans, close to the people, who were not oblivious to their views, who wished to carry out their desires, who joined with us in removing the taxes in part from the masses and placing them upon those best able to bear them—the wealth of the country—that we were able to increase the maximum surtax from 32 per cent to 50 per cent.

That roiled the President. I do not know why, but I can imagine why. I have heard that it was because he was in close touch with the reactionary, the predatory, elements in this country, who have bled the people for their own benefit for years; that he was in frequent conferences with these high financiers and that certain promises had been made to them—election pledges, may I say—and that they had called the turn, and said to him, "It is time to deliver, and the best way to deliver is in the tax bill, by taking from us some of the taxes which have been imposed on us and placing them on Ford automobiles and on the necessaries of life."

So they called his hand, and the President, true to the "powers" that had placed him in the White House, not forgetful of his promises, in turn said to the Republican leadership in Congress, "Let us come across, boys." So he was ruffled and angered when the House did not do his bidding.

I know it surprised the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Utah, because it was the plan, well laid but not carried out successfully, that there would be a compromise between the 32 per cent maximum surtax on large incomes as passed by the House and the 50 per cent passed by the Senate, when in conference all the differences were not ironed out and a compromise such as suggested by the President of 40 per cent was not incorporated in the bill. But things went awry. The plans miscarried, and consequently they adopted in the House what we passed here, and for that the President yesterday in his message expressed—briefly, yes; but quite explicitly, so that all could understand—that he did not approve the course of certain Senators here who had joined with the Democratic minority and put over that 50 per cent maximum surtax.

The Senator from Kansas and other Senators have no doubt read that part of the President's speech where he takes a rap at the agricultural group. I am sorry the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] is not in his seat. I am sorry that some of the other Senators who have fought for the agricultural interests are not in their seats, who, if they had not fought as they did, would not have procured the enactment of certain legislation which has been, in part at least, beneficial to the agricultural classes. But the President took his shot at those fellows. I do not know whether they will lose their patronage or not. I hope not. It would be very unfair if, because these few Senators have joined with us and voted in the interest of the people, they should be rebuked by having the patronage in their States taken away from them. In his message this is what the President said:

> There is vastly greater security, immensely more of the national viewpoint, much larger and prompter accomplishment where our divisions are along party lines, in the broader and loftier sense, than to divide geographically, or according to pursuits or personal following.

Oh, he was hitting the agricultural group. Yet I saw in the morning papers that one distinguished leader of that group had said it was a very splendid message to the Congress. What did he get out of the message, or what did others of the agricultural group get out of the message, that holds any encouragement to them? Is it that he suggests in this message the enactment of the cooperative marketing plan? He is adroit. He wants to hand to the farmers just a little sop, because he knows it does not take much to influence the votes of some Senators. So he thought perhaps if he said to them, "I am in favor of the enactment of the cooperative marketing plan," that would cause such jubilation among some of the agricultural group that they would find no fault with his condemnation of their actions in other matters. He should have praised the agricultural group, because good legislation that has come, as I said, for the agricultural classes has been in large part due to their activities, their joining with us, not on party lines but for the good of the country.

Some time ago when another President was in the White House and an election was coming on he addressed a letter to the American voters in which he asked that a Democratic House of Representatives be elected. Republican Senators and Congressmen and leaders condemned it. They said he had no right to plead with the voters along party lines for the election of those Members of Congress. You scorned that President for his action. You said it was unfair, and that it had never been done by any President before. Yet the President to-day, who no doubt condemned that message of yesterday to the American voter, in his speech to the American Congress on yesterday pleaded for adherence to party lines.

Yes; he thought by that means that he might influence the distinguished junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] and those who have worked with him for agricultural legislation to stop associating with Democrats in obtaining it, and vote with the Republican leadership upon all measures.

It may be that it was the first call of the President for Republican Senators to line up as a party policy to retain a seat in this body for TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY, who has been shown to have expended approximately $200,000 in his campaign in Michigan. It may be that he wants to force them in line so that this friend of the President might hold his seat here, even though a jury of his own constituents in Michigan, after hearing all the evidence and the pleas in his behalf, had convicted him by unanimous vote of the jury. Ah, I say to Senators on the other side of the Chamber that there are many questions which arise here that have no party tinge. We over here have joined with some of you in passing wholesome amendments to some bills that were in the original form inimical to the welfare of all the people. We expect to continue to vote with you when you propose legislation that is in the interest of the people.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPENCER in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I know that the Senator from Mississippi desires to be entirely fair, but his statement in reference to the Newberry case is, to say the least, not full. Mr. Newberry was indicted in Michigan for conspiracy to violate a law which the Supreme Court of the United States said was unconstitutional. The Supreme Court said that there was no evidence whatever of corruption on the part of Mr. Newberry, and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] admitted on the floor of the Senate that there was no bribery.

Now, the Senator from Mississippi can easily learn, if he does not now know, that there is no limit whatever placed upon the amount of money which can be spent for specified purposes under the Michigan law. If Truman H. Newberry is guilty of any offense whatever it is under the Michigan law, under which law he has never been prosecuted. There was no evidence whatever to prove that Mr. Newberry had any personal knowledge or gave his consent to the expenditure of the $200,000 to which the Senator from Mississippi alludes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I heard only a portion of the statement of my distinguished friend from Georgia. I am a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections and am reasonably familiar with the record, having read the entire record twice and some portions of it several times. If the Senator from Mississippi will permit, I desire to express my dissent from the statement of the Senator from Georgia as to the facts as disclosed by the record. I think the record conclusively establishes that more than $200,000 was expended, indeed, more than $267,000, and that Mr. Newberry not only was familiar with this large expenditure but that a considerable portion of it came from his own bank account; that Mr. Newberry himself wrote a letter in which he stated, in substance, that he was responsible for the expenses of publicity, and the record shows that the publicity expenses exceeded the sum of $140,000.

I do not desire to be drawn into a discussion of the case at this time, but I did feel that the broad statement of my good friend from Georgia, whose good faith and integrity I readily accept and to which I pay tribute, should go unchallenged. I did not want his statement to go unchallenged that the record showed the facts as he has stated them. I have no doubt my friend after his reading of the record is sincere in that view and believes that the record will support the statement which he has made.

I wish to make the further statement that if the officials of the State of Michigan did their duty they would have prosecuted a large number of those who participated in that election, who helped to expend the money, and who joined in the conspiracy to expend a large sum of money to secure the nomination of Mr. Newberry for the office of United States Senator and his election to the Senate of the United States.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Mississippi will allow me a brief rejoinder to that statement. I will challenge now the Senator from Utah or any other Senator to cite the evidence that connects Newberry with the improper use of a single dollar of money in that election. The conviction to which the Senator from Mississippi refers was in part brought about by the expenditure of $400,000 of Government money in raking up testimony and in hiring extra lawyers to prosecute Mr. Newberry, to convict him, to send him to the penitentiary, so he could not come here and vote against the League of Nations.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me?

Mr. HARRISON. With pleasure.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator from Georgia stated that he challenged anyone to cite evidence that the Senator from Michigan was connected with the expenditure of the money, for which act his right to a seat in this body is now challenged.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Illegal expenditure.

Mr. CARAWAY. It was practically all illegal.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Oh, that is not fair.

Mr. CARAWAY. For instance, the money was spent to bribe or to hire people who were not for him to become his supporters. It was spent for people to work on primary day, when the law forbade doing that. The record shows conclusively that it did go beyond that, and to deny that would be to deny what everybody knows to be the truth. Paul King went to a man in Flint, Mich., so the man swears, who had been convicted and sentenced to the penitentiary for from 2 to 15 years, and whose case was then on appeal, and tried to get him to support Newberry. He said, "I am not going to do it. I am not for Newberry, and will not be." Mr. Fletcher, who was with him, said, "Oh, well, let me talk to this man."

Fletcher said, "You know how I stand at the capitol at Lansing." I am not quoting his exact language. "You can support Newberry or you can go to jail, just whichever you see fit." He said, "I do not want you to say whether you will or not, but we know you control this district and we will know when the votes are cast on which side you were." The man said, "I went out and talked to my henchmen and said, 'They have put it up to me, and while I don't care whether Newberry is elected or not, I think I had better play safe,' and this district went for Mr. Newberry and my case was reversed."

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. CARAWAY. Wait a minute. I am not through. There were four people present, all of them supporting Newberry. Mr. King denied it and the other three men who were present never opened their mouths to say whether that conversation occurred or not. That is one of the cases.

The Senator has said that Mr. Newberry did not know about these acts and expenditures. On the 8th day of August Newberry got a letter from a man by the name of Vandenberg about the expenditure of money in the Newberry campaign for the Senate in Michigan. I am not using the exact language. King said Newberry did not know how much and for what purpose they were expending money; that he never talked this phase of the campaign over with Newberry. Templeton said he never discussed it with him. Every man connected with the campaign said, "I never discussed finances with Commander Newberry at all." Therefore Newberry's supporters in the Senate say that Newberry knew nothing about the method or means of conducting his campaign. Let us see. On the 8th day of August this letter of Vandenberg came to him. It conveyed the information, if he had not already known it, that his campaign had become a campaign of corruption. Mr. Newberry replied, "I am informed that the Newberry committee can file its report and justify its expenditures." Who told him that? King said, "I did not do it." Templeton said, "I did not do it." Floyd said, "I did not do it." Everyone connected with the campaign denied giving Newberry the information.

Everybody who talked in behalf of Newberry on the floor of the Senate said no one ever communicated to Newberry the fact that money was being expended in connection with his campaign in Michigan, and yet on the 11th day of August he wrote to Vandenberg and said, "I am informed that these expenditures can be justified," and then he wrote to King and said, "I hand you herewith my letter that I wrote to the people at Flint, giving my superficial and flimsy explanation." That is not the term he used. The exact words were "my noncommittal letter."

Newberry did know all about the expenditure of money in his campaign, unless he was not telling the truth when he wrote to Mr. Vandenberg, because he said, "I am informed that the committee can account for my expenditures." So I know, whether Mr. Newberry keeps his seat in the Senate or not—I know it as well as I know that I am standing here—that Newberry knew about these expenditures of money. I also know that under the statute of Michigan the money was expended unlawfully. I know more than that; I know that Newberry gave a power of attorney to Smith, and Smith gave money in the name of John Newberry to this committee. Up to the 16th day of August he gave every dollar that the record shows that Newberry's committee had.

On the 27th day of July Newberry called up Smith—I am now talking about Commander Newberry, about the Senator—and said, "I want to know"—I am not quoting his language, but I am stating the substance of it—"I want to know something about this taking money out of my account, or all of our accounts down there, and putting it into my campaign for the Senate. I want to know how much longer it must continue." Senators are familiar with that matter. It comes into this record by reason of the fact that on the next day Smith sent Newberry a telegram and said, "I misinformed you about the date when these expenditures would cease. I told you they would cease on the 27th day of July; I meant the 27th day of August, because the expenses enumerated must go on until primary day." That was to Commander Newberry. Then, in explanation of that, he said that Newberry was complaining about their using his money—in fact, everybody's money—to finance the campaign and the extravagant use of this money.

The Michigan law says one may not give or loan. Newberry knew that his money was being "borrowed" to put into the account of his brother, John Newberry, and then to be taken out of John Newberry's account and given to the committee, so called, of his friends and by that committee used to buy a seat in this Senate. By the way, the committee did not consist of a single unpaid employee, because Templeton says he was a figurehead, although he is set down as chairman; and Blair, normally treasurer, says, "I did not know anything about even what I swore to," in the report of expenses. So the only men who touched that whole campaign, that Newberry swore was conducted by a voluntary committee of his friends, consisted of paid employees unless it be said that King was not paid; and King said that he expected to get his pay by being employed at some time as a lawyer, to look after some of the very numerous and valuable litigation that the Newberry estate had.

The bulk of the expenditures, according to the sworn statement, occurred after the 27th day of July. Less than $40,000 had been expended on the 16th day of August, if the sworn statement may be believed. I do not believe it; but if it may be believed, only $40,000 had been expended—I am speaking in round numbers—on the 16th day of August. The admissions show that more than $200,000 were expended in the campaign, and the expenditure possibly reached three-quarters of a million dollars. So at least $160,000 were expended after the conversation had with Newberry on the 28th day of July, or possibly $175,000 were expended after that. Newberry knew that when he was having this conversation with Smith that Smith was using the accounts of Truman Newberry, of his wife, of his brother, and, in fact, of all the Newberry estate, and feeding them into John Newberry's account to be expended in Truman Newberry's campaign for the Senate. He knew that, because Smith swears it, and nobody denies it, except the Senator from Georgia, and he is merely giving his impression. Nobody denies it who knows what the record shows.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I am going to give the Senator another impression presently.

Mr. CARAWAY. It will be no more accurate than the one the Senator gave a moment ago.

Newberry knew that; he knew on the 28th day of July his money was being used to finance the disgraceful purchase of a seat in the Senate; he knew the way this money reached this campaign committee was by Smith's transferring his account under a power of attorney. Smith was Newberry's attorney in fact. Newberry could have revoked that power of attorney that day and stopped the expenditure of over $50,000 that was taken—oh, yes, over $80,000 that was taken—out of the Newberry estate, his own money largely. Certainly the Senator from Georgia, who—and I may be pardoned for saying it, and I do so in all kindness—admits that he is the best lawyer that ever sat in this body, would not contend that a man could escape liability for the act of his attorney in fact, when all he would have to do to stop his activities was to revoke his power of attorney. Therefore Truman Newberry knew that this money, Truman Newberry's money, was being taken out of his account and by passing it through his brother's account would be expended in his campaign for another month, and he permitted it. To show the absolute absurdity of Smith's explanation, he said that he told Mr. Newberry that the primary was on the 27th day of July, and he would want us to believe that Newberry did not even know whether the primary in which he was a candidate for the Senate was in July or August!

If there ever was an aggregation of men who would be entitled to a certificate for absolute lack of intelligence, if one could believe the record, those who ran Truman Newberry's campaign for the Senate would meet the requirements. If any body of men ever handled $200,000 with less information than they possessed, if one could believe them on oath, I should like to see them. So much for the contention that Newberry did not know how his money was being expended.

My good friend, Senator Newberry's colleague from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], recognizing that the employment of people to work on primary day was illegal, said—and honestly so, although he was mistaken about it—that the committee countermanded the order to permit people to be employed to work on primary day. But they did hire men to work on primary day; they were given from $7 to $10 a day; they filled every ward and precinct, so far as the record shows, with paid workers on primary day. To show that they could hire men, they hired a man who was a superintendent of a division of the Buick Automobile Co., who said, "I think Ford is a good man; but," he said, "after they talked to me two or three hours and told me there was something in it, I went in this campaign in that way." "That way" was $150; and the next time he got another $150. He said, "That is what I understood I was going to get." All these men were hired. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]—I know the Senator from Georgia intended to be absolutely fair with him, but he misquoted him—did not admit that there was no bribery in the record; he merely said, "I was not discussing that feature." The Supreme Court never decided that bribery was not a part of the methods used by Newberry. The court never said that; the Supreme Court never passed on that question at all; the only thing the Supreme Court decided was that the Federal act was unconstitutional; that is absolutely everything the Supreme Court did decide, and that is all it could have decided.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I hope the Senator will yield to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] is incorrect in saying that I was inaccurate in quoting the words of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. The RECORD will show that I quoted his exact words. He was in his usual seat, and I was in mine, and the question of bribery was put to him direct, and he said there was no bribery. Then I said afterwards, "You have admitted your case out of court"; and the RECORD will show it.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator will pardon me, he will have so much less to take back if he will read the RECORD, and I am going to get it in a moment.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. If the RECORD does not show that, then somebody has changed the RECORD. I know exactly what I said.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator may think he did.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield further; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to both Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can not yield to both Senators at the same time.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I asked the Senator from Montana, in substance, "Do you claim that there was bribery?" He said, in so many words, "There was no bribery." Later I said in my speech, and it will so appear of record, "The Senator from Montana had admitted his case out of court."

The question was raised between him and me as lawyers, that he was construing a criminal statute by the principle of civil construction, to wit, he was, by imputation, placing a knowledge of crime and a proof of crime upon Mr. Newberry, whereas that can not be done. A crime has to be proven by competent evidence, which excludes all reasonable doubt; and, if the evidence is circumstantial in its nature, it has to exclude every other reasonable hypothesis than that of the guilt of the accused. Even an accomplice, a man who confesses that he and another have committed a crime, can not convict his principal unless that accomplice be so corroborated by other testimony as almost to make out a case of itself, independent of the accomplice. A man's own confession, Mr. President, made out of court, of course, can not convict him, it can not even be admitted in evidence, unless it be shown beforehand that that confession was freely and voluntarily made without the remotest fear of injury or the least hope of reward.

I do not claim to be the best lawyer in this body, but I do claim to know something about the law. As to a power of attorney, the law as I understand it is this: It empowers the agent to do what is therein stated in writing. Every man who deals with a man holding a power of attorney must examine into the agent's authority; and if that agent executes a deed or a mortgage under that power of attorney, the power of attorney itself must be attached to the deed or a certified copy thereof must be attached to it, else the deed will be invalid. If a person holding a power of attorney from me or from the Senator from Arkansas goes beyond the terms of that power of attorney, we are not bound by the actions of the agent who has exceeded his authority under the power of attorney. If that is not sound law, then I do not know what law is.

Mr. CARAWAY. I admit that.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Yes; the Senator admits that; and he will admit some other things before I sit down.

Mr. CARAWAY. May I interrupt the Senator for just a moment?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. By the permission of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], who had the floor two or three hours ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not want the admission to be understood as relating to the correctness of what the Senator has said the law was. He said if that was not the law, he did not know what law was, and that was the statement that I was admitting. I said that in all kindness; it was a bit of byplay. The question of a power of attorney, and whether a copy of it should be attached to a deed or mortgage, I am sure, has nothing to do with this case, because the power of attorney gave Smith the authority to draw checks, and that is what he was doing. But this is the principle of law that is applicable—and the Senator is going all around it—that if two or more men enter into a conspiracy to do an unlawful thing, to wit, buy an election in Michigan, then so long as the conspiracy lives and lasts the act of each and every one of them is the act of each of them; and after they had entered into the agreement to buy this election, so long as that conspiracy lived, and until the fact was an accomplished fact, the act of each and every one of them, whether done in the presence of the others or not, or whether contemplated at the time of entering into the conspiracy, if it was something to forward the purpose of the conspiracy, was the act of all of them, and all of them are guilty.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, it is elementary law that before anyone can be held accountable for the acts of an agent the agency must first be proved, and that agency is either general or special. In the instance of a power of attorney, the authority of the agent must appear on the face of the power of attorney, and before the principal can be held responsible for anything done by the holder of the power of attorney it must appear either that the agent confined himself to the powers given to him or that the principal became a party to his exceeding the powers granted to him.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator, then, permit me to say that if the principal knows what use his agent is making of his agency, and does not check him, I presume he would be said to have ratified it, would he not?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. After the fact; yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. And if Truman Newberry knew that the agent was taking his money and passing it into this campaign agency, and was going to continue to do it, and he did not object, the Senator would say that he ratified it, would he not?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I would; but, Mr. President, the Federal statute is out of the case by the decision of a court whose findings we are bound to respect. The court decided that the statute was unconstitutional in that it invaded the rights of the States, and the court said—whether it decided it or not—that there was no evidence of conspiracy or bribery.

Mr. CARAWAY. I beg the Senator's pardon; the court did not say that.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. If the Senator will get the decision I will show it to him right away.

Mr. CARAWAY. No; one justice said that.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. A justice who concurred—Chief Justice White.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, but what a justice may have said in concurring in an opinion is not the saying of the court. That is merely the dictum of the judge who declares that. The court decided but one thing, and that was that the act was unconstitutional.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. If the Senator will send for the volume—to which I have not even referred, because the matter came up here unexpectedly—I will show him where that language is used.

Mr. CARAWAY. That the court said it?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Chief Justice White did not dissent from the opinion of the majority. He concurred in it.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Chief Justice did dissent from the opinion of the majority. All that the majority of the court decided was that the act was unconstitutional, and the Chief Justice did dissent from that.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, the record shows that the Chief Justice reached the same conclusion by a different course of reasoning.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, no; the Chief Justice said the case ought to have been reversed by reason of the erroneous instruction of the lower court; but the Supreme Court only decided that the act was unconstitutional; and he concurred in the reversal of the case, but not in the opinion of the court.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. If the Senator will send for the volume, I will show him that my statement of it is absolutely correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi has the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, this is a very interesting discussion, but I should like to proceed as soon as I can with the few remarks I desire to make.

Mr. President, I do not care to be diverted from the question which I was discussing by these technical discussions of the Newberry case. If I had thought it would cause such a discussion, I probably would not have said what I did say. I merely said that it may be that the President on yesterday, in appealing to the partisan spirit of Senators and Congressmen to cleave to party lines, had in mind the Newberry case, and he wanted to hold in line those men who in the past had shown some independence of action and had not listened to Executive dictation, that they might vote in the interest of the people and purity of elections against Newberry being seated. It may be that he desired to help Newberry out. Of course, I know not whether that was in his mind or not.

I said in the course of my remarks that Newberry was charged with spending $200,000 in his election. The lieutenant governor, as I recall, said in a letter that he wrote to Newberry that it looked as though they were spending between a quarter of a million and half a million dollars. I said, too, that on the charges that had been preferred against Newberry a jury, by the unanimous vote of 12 men sitting thereon, had found him guilty, and that a judge had imposed a penalty on that verdict.

I know, and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] knows, that no citizen of Michigan who sat on that jury wanted to convict Newberry. He hoped, as no doubt every citizen of Michigan desired, that the escutcheon of that State might not be tainted; that it might be shown that Newberry was not guilty; that the finger of scorn and contempt might not be pointed by all the people of the country to the electorate of Michigan.

Ah, there were people in Michigan who no doubt prayed that Newberry might be acquitted; but the facts were too strong. They were overwhelming, and notwithstanding the desire of the men who composed that jury that the fair name of Michigan might not be tarnished by this man's actions, they could do nothing else but find him guilty. Yet there will be Senators here, when the vote is taken, who believe that Newberry spent enormous sums of money, to the extent of $190,000, and yet they will vote to seat him. Why? Because you want to cleave to party lines.

Is it because in that close session of Congress, when you had perhaps one or two majority, you needed Newberry to form the Foreign Relations Committee with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] as chairman, that the League of Nations might be defeated and the hope of the world for peace might be banished, that now you feel that you will pay back your party by voting to seat Newberry? The intimation was made, it was insinuated, that the League of Nations had something to do with it. I dislike to discuss the proposition. The Newberry case is so nauseating that it would befoul the discussion of any question, and I did not desire to say anything about it.

The discussion between the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Arkansas has taken away from me the line of thought that I was indulging in; but it has brought some of the agricultural group into the Chamber, and so I can now proceed.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator allow a brief interruption?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I do not know whether the Senator is a lawyer or not. Is he?

Mr. HARRISON. I used to be before I got to associating with some of you fellows.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I will remind the Senator from Mississippi—who, I am sure, is as good a lawyer as he ever was—that the jury in this case had no discretion at all.

Mr. HARRISON. They convicted Newberry, did they not?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The verdict was, in effect, directed by the court. They could not escape it, under instructions which the Supreme Court said ought never to have been given.

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, yes; but the court always instructs juries.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The judge convicted him, and the Supreme Court judges reversed his conviction.

Mr. HARRISON. Well, Mr. President, we will leave the Newberry case. We will finish him up later, and those Senators who vote to seat him will be finished up a few months after that.

What I was saying when I was diverted was this: The President on yesterday, amongst other things, after condemning President Wilson some months ago for writing that letter asking to have a Democratic Congress elected, says:

> Ours is a popular Government through political parties.

I want my friend from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], the Progressive Senator from Kansas, who has been so helpful to this side of the aisle in passing some wholesome legislation, those of us who have worked in a nonpartisan kind of a way to bring about the cooperative marketing system and some other legislation, to listen to this part of it. The President says:

> We divide along political lines, and I would ever have it so. * * * Granting that we are fundamentally a representative popular Government, with political parties the governing agencies, I believe the political party in power should assume responsibility, determine upon policies in the conference which supplements conventions and election campaigns, and then strive for achievement through adherence to the accepted policy.
> There is vastly greater security, immensely more of the national viewpoint, much larger and prompter accomplishment where our divisions are along party lines, in the broader and loftier sense—

Here is where he was slapping the Members of the Senate who form the agricultural group. Here is where he was rapping those Senators who joined with us to put the 50 per cent maximum surtax upon the wealth of the country—> than to divide geographically, or according to pursuits, or personal following.

Is there any Senator here who doubts, when the President employed that language, that he had in mind the agricultural bloc? No, Senators. He says:

> The shield to the high-minded public servant who adheres to party policy is manifest.

It is a clarion call from him for you to stand together as a party. No matter how a measure or amendment that is presented by this side of the aisle may appeal to you, it matters not what convictions of right may be written in suggestions from this side of the aisle, you are to cleave to your party and stand together and fight those amendments and those suggestions. And then he hands this mild compliment to you. Oh, it is different from the compliments he wrote to Senator McCORMICK in that celebrated letter on the "monumental accomplishments" of the Republican Party—the "remarkable achievements," said President Harding, of the last Congress. That was before you took the recess, and you remember in that letter that he said—

> Now that you have taken a recess, and you do it because of your monumental achievements, when you come back you can pass the tax revision bill and revise the present tariff.

Well, which one did you pass? The tax revision bill? Yes; and in the next sentence of this remarkable message he condemns your work. Why, he says this:

> It would suggest insincerity if I expressed complete accord with every expression recorded in your roll calls.

He is hitting at you Senators who voted for that 50 per cent maximum surtax. He is striking at the Members of the House who voted to concur in the Senate amendment, the amendment that was pushed through this body by the Democratic minority and the agricultural bloc, which he condemns and invites you to have nothing more to do with. I believe there are Senators on the other side who have the interests of the people too much at heart to take the suggestion of President Harding—abolish their good work, disrupt the bloc, and cease to work and labor in the interest of the agricultural masses.

He goes further and says, when he tells you he is not in accord with all your votes:

> Later on, when other problems are solved—

I do not know what problems he is talking about.

> Later on, when other problems are solved, I shall make some recommendations about renewed consideration of our tax program.

In the remarkable letter which he wrote to Senator McCORMICK, which was to help Senator BURSUM in New Mexico, he spoke of the monumental achievements of the Republican Congress, and the monumental achievements that he promised immediately after the recess were the tax revision bill and tariff legislation. The tax bill which was passed is condemned by him in his first public utterance to Congress after the recess, and he tells you he is not satisfied with it, and that he will ask you, as soon as the other problems are out of the way, for a renewed consideration of it.

Are you Senators who voted before for the 50 per cent surtax going to retreat, as you did on the soldier bonus bill? Are you going to back up and follow the President in "renewed consideration of the tax program"? If you do, you know what will happen.

Ah, Secretary Mellon expressed the views of President Harding, and here they are in this report just published. He wants you to put a tax on automobiles, the same amount on a Ford, which might cost $395, as on a Packard, which might cost $6,000 or $7,000. Of course, the Secretary might have it in for Ford because Ford happened to run against Newberry, and the Secretary wants to put the same tax on a little, cheap Ford car as on a high-priced limousine. That is the recommendation of Mellon, the Secretary of the Treasury, the second richest man in the United States. He is close to the wealth of the country, and he is carrying out the views of President Harding on tax matters, and in this late edition, fresh from the press, just published, later, perhaps, than the President's message of yesterday, as I have just been able to get it, after he abuses these high surtaxes, he said, among other things:

The income tax is firmly embedded in our system of taxation, and the objections made are not to the principle of the tax but only to the excessively high rates. We hear much of the need of simplifying our tax laws, and there is room for this. * * * So long as the rates were low there was not much difficulty in the administration of the law, even though the system was entirely new and the organization administering it unfamiliar with the operation of such a law.

* * * * * * *

To reduce the surtax rates to a maximum of 25 per cent and grading the reductions through all the brackets would mean an apparent loss of about $130,000,000 in revenue. A 20 per cent maximum rate on the same basis would involve a revenue loss of about $200,000,000. Other adjustments which should be made would probably involve an amount equal to that made in the surtax rates. This loss of revenue, however, would not be permanent, for the reduced rates would ultimately be productive of more revenue than higher rates due to the increase in taxable transactions.

If this loss of revenue could not be met by rigid economy in expenditures, the revenue required could be raised either by placing a tax on certain specific articles or by a low-rate general tax on a broad class of articles or transactions.

He wants to tax them all.

Such taxes as those now imposed on automobiles and tires have been found simple and inexpensive of administration, and the collection is always substantially current.

So reads this remarkable document, and I desire to have that part of this report which offers the remedy for existing tax ills placed in the RECORD following my remarks. (See Appendix.)

I do not know whether the Secretary is standing for a 20 per cent maximum surtax or whether he is standing for a 25 per cent maximum surtax, but he wants to relieve wealth of its just share of taxes and place it upon the masses of this country. That is what the President was hitting the agricultural group about. I am not unaware, and you are not, that the President of the United States to-day stands in higher favor than does the Republican Congress. God knows I know not what for, because he has done nothing to merit higher esteeem than has the Republican Congress.

The good legislation passed by this body and the other did not come at the suggestion of the President, and the good legislation which should have been passed was blocked by the President. If you had listened to the President of the United States you would have placed the surtax at 40 per cent or 32 per cent or perhaps 20 or 25 per cent. He wrote the letter to Congress and asked it to carry out that plan; but the House turned him down. Some of you tried to give some relief, I think six or seven of you. You were pretty solid for the soldiers' bonus bill at first, but as soon as the President cracked his whip and came here you deserted the soldiers and laid down on that proposition.

So I know not why the President stands in favor to-day. Is it because of the conference which is being held here? I would not say a word against it. My lips are sealed for the present. I wish for it every success. But that conference has met here not because of the President but in spite of the President. It is meeting here because of the great fight that was waged by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and a Democratic minority that was persistent and irresistible, and it was only accepted when there was nothing else remaining for him to do. He was moved because the sentiment of the country became crystallized and moved him to call it.

But let me go further. Here is the compliment he pays you at this time. It is just like a man saying he is going to strike you and then pulling out a piece of chewing gum to do it with. He says:

It would be ungracious to withhold acknowledgment of the really large volume and excellent quality of work accomplished by the extraordinary session of Congress which so recently adjourned.

Wonderful! The only thing he says you did is—

The first budget is before you. Its preparation is a signal achievement.

I think the printer must have made a mistake. I think instead of "a signal achievement" it should have been "a single achievement."

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. If the Senator is correct in his analysis that the President——

Mr. HARRISON. I have not finished yet.

Mr. EDGE. That the President stands stronger with the country than the Congress, and is likewise correct in his assumption that the President is entirely dissatisfied with the tax bill as passed by the Congress——

Mr. HARRISON. I did not say that standing was very high, either.

Mr. EDGE. I understood the Senator to say, though I do not recall his exact remarks, that he well understood that the President stood higher in the esteem of the public than did the Republican Congress.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; higher than the Congress. Both are in very bad odor, however.

Mr. EDGE. If the Senator is correct in that analysis, and is also correct in the further statement that the President is not satisfied with the tax bill, then does the Senator mean to assume that the public are satisfied with the tax bill? And if they are satisfied with the President's position it would seem to me that the Senator's position is rather contradictory.

Mr. HARRISON. I am quite sure that the public is not satisfied with that bill.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator just made the statement, as I understood him, that the public was holding the President in higher esteem than it held the Republican Congress, whose only accomplishment he states was the passage of the tax bill.

Mr. HARRISON. I said that the only thing that is narrated here as a signal accomplishment—which must have been an error, as he must have meant to say "single accomplishment"—is the budget bill, which was passed, and if the Senator understood me, I said that the President to-day is in higher standing than the Republican Congress, which I think is true, though I do not know why.

Mr. EDGE. It is a great satisfaction to all Republicans to realize that the official censor of the Republican majority in the Senate believes that the President stands in such high esteem in the country. I absolutely acquiesce in his view. I think it is remarkable. I do not know of a time in history when the President stood higher in the esteem of the public than our present President does, and I am very glad to know that the official censor thinks likewise.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not agree with the Senator at all that he stands so high. He stood a little higher a few months ago than he does now, and he stands a little higher now than he will in a few months from now; and if the Senator and his colleagues continue to go as they are going now, vote to have Newberry retain his seat, and pass such legislation as they have passed, they will find out what the people think about them at the first opportunity they have to express their opinion at the ballot box.

Mr. EDGE. I always enjoy the arguments of the Senator from Mississippi, but when he places himself in the position of being a prophet I am not particularly impressed with his success. I recall similar prophecies when he took such a very important part in the last campaign. It occurs to me that those prophecies were quite ill placed, and perhaps he will have the same success with his prophecies to-day.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; those were pretty bad prophecies. I was mistaken. I am sorry to say that the people made a mistake. They see it now; they understand it.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator is very fair.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from New Jersey has made some prophecies, and so has his colleague made prophecies. They have made many prophecies. They made a prophecy in that campaign, when I was prophesying because I thought the people were fair and had just good, ordinary, common sense, and would not turn out an administration and a Congress which had brought such remarkable prosperity to the people, when every factory was humming, when every man was employed, when banks had more money than they had ever had before, when you could not see a tramp anywhere, when you could not get a box car to ship your products to market, when the ships were laden, carrying our goods to the markets of the world, when wages were high and the farmer's efforts were abundantly compensated. You said that if the Democrats got back there would be hard times, but that the prosperity would continue if the Republicans got in. As soon as you got in your prophecy went for naught. The factories have stopped; men to the number of 6,000,000, according to the figures in the report of the Republican Secretary of Labor, are thrown out of employment, cars are idle on every sidetrack throughout the country. As I passed through Illinois the other day the farmers said they were getting but 20 cents a bushel for their corn. Prices are soaring high, but the farmers do not get the benefit of the high prices. There is a situation in this country of such complexity, confusion, uncertainty, and doubt that nobody knows exactly just where he is.

Mr. EDGE. Perhaps the Senator does not care to admit it—I do not wish to interfere with his line of argument or debate—but, of course, some of us realize, and I am quite sure the business public and farmers, who are included in the business public and a very important part of the business public, recognize the fact that it requires more than seven months to undo the misadministration of eight years.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; and if the Senator's party continues as it is going now it will take about seven years to write a tariff bill. In the campaign three years ago, when the Republican Congress was first elected, the people were promised an immediate revision of the tariff. Two years passed by and no general tariff bill was written. You have been here in control now of this branch and the White House, too, for eight months or more, and you promised again a revision of the tariff. The bill passed the House only a few weeks ago, and the President condemned it on yesterday in his message. Why, he holds it up to scorn. He tells you practically that you are not fit to write a tariff bill. He condemns the American valuation plan because he finds fault with it as carried in the Fordney bill. The bill now rests serenely in your Committee on Finance, with little hope or expectation of it being soon disturbed. He said that authority should be given to the President of the United States to fix the rates. No more is the Congress to write the rates as they have been written from the very foundation of this Government. Oh, he apologized for wanting more authority, and he asked you to excuse him for even suggesting Executive encroachment, and yet he said he wants you to pass a law amending the Constitution, if need be, to give to the Tariff Commission greater and broader powers, fixing maximum and minimum rates, and allowing the President to exercise the autocratic power of fixing the rates upon every product brought into this country. Do you recall any other President who has ever asked for such monumental and stupendous power as that? That is worse than the American valuation scheme, bad as it is.

Mr. EDGE. I am sure the Senator does not wish to get into a tariff debate at the present time.

Mr. HARRISON. It matters little to me. Now is as good as any time to discuss it.

Mr. EDGE. I shall be glad to meet the Senator on that question at any time when that bill is before the Senate. I think there is very much to commend it, but tradition sometimes may well be forgotten in the light of the actual conditions which exist. When the time arrives that the American Congress can not trust some one, can not delegate such authority as is necessary to be delegated in order properly to administer the business of the country, then, in my judgment, it spells disaster from the industrial standpoint. However, that is a very large question, as the Senator knows, and can not be discussed in a hurried way by a mere passage of words back and forth.

Mr. HARRISON. If I correctly read the Senators' interview in the morning papers, he did not indorse that part of the President's address.

Mr. EDGE. Indeed, the Senator did, most decisively and emphatically.

Mr. HARRISON. And he is for that plan?

Mr. EDGE. I am.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Senator is going to be almost by himself on that proposition.

It was really pitiful, and I am, indeed, sorry that the President in his remarkable message yesterday did not congratulate you Republicans on the passage of the emergency tariff bill. That is one thing you have done. That is one thing you passed through here. You took several bites at it, but finally you passed the so-called emergency tariff bill. The President hardly mentioned that. You said that when that bill passed that prosperity would come to the farmers, that it would help them to get higher prices for their live stock, that the price of corn would go up, wheat would go up, that everything would be helped that is raised by the farmers of the country, and yet to-day we have one of the most deplorable conditions ever experienced by the American farmer.

That which was predicted did not take place. Somebody else prophesied wrongly. Corn has not been so low in years. The live-stock interests are bankrupt; the agricultural situation is disheartening.

I think when the emergency tariff bill was passed corn was selling at between 75 cents and a dollar a bushel. To-day in parts of the country it is selling at 20 cents a bushel, and yet the President's message on yesterday appeals to some of the Senators from the corn belt, because the President said, "Let us buy 10,000,000 bushels of this corn and send it over to Russia and give to the famine-stricken area over there some corn." Some may think, since the emergency tariff bill had failed and the high tariff that was placed upon corn at that time failed to help the situation, that perhaps it can be helped by sending some corn over to Russia.

Mr. President, this message of yesterday is as confusing as it is vague, as conflicting as it is contradictory. The President said he does not want to see the United States industrially and commercially isolated, and yet the same President would have us in our international relations isolated and excluded from the other nations of the world. I can not for the life of me read that message on broadening the trade and commerce of the country and realize that he who uttered it and his former colleagues who indorse it, who voted against the Versailles treaty isolating us from the other nations of the world, would erect tariff barriers against trade with other countries.

The cooperative marketing scheme was indorsed by the President on yesterday. I am glad to see that. That has caught my friend, the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER]. He thinks it a great message because of that. That bill has been pending here for three years. It was here for a year and eight months while President Harding was a Senator, and yet his party has been unable up to this good hour to pass a bill incorporating the cooperative marketing plan. I hope that that same influence which has exerted itself in the past and caused some of you Senators to get a move on yourselves and pass some legislation will have a similar effect on you with respect to this suggestion of the President to see that the cooperative marketing plan is embodied in a bill that will be passed by the Congress.

The President in his message alluded to irrigation in the West, proposing to take over and improve some of those wild and waste lands there. He wanted to catch the ear of the West and bring some Senators from that faraway section under obligation to him, so that he might keep up his work and they dance to the music. Why, my colleagues, you had an opportunity to vote for that bill. That is the McNary bill offered by the distinguished senior Senator from Oregon. During the last Congress, in the closing hours of the extra session, I thought so much of the proposition that I made a motion to take up the bill and I met a violent and united opposition, it seemed to me, from the other side of the Chamber. Oh, Senators, if you had joined with those of us on this side of the Chamber that night when I made the motion to take up the McNary bill and had passed the legislation now suggested by the President, instead of talking to you and pleading with you now to pass the legislation he could have commended you for having done it.

So it goes, Mr. President. I shall not occupy the time of the Senate longer. I rose merely for the purpose of trying to ascertain why the railroad funding bill, about which we have heard so much and upon which its proponents have insisted the prosperity of the railroads and the country generally depend and which has been urged repeatedly by the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce and which we were told just a few days ago, in the closing hours of the extra session, would be made the unfinished business before the Senate, has not been brought up now. But the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] has told me it was because the situation has improved so much that stocks have gone up and the industrial market is in such splendid condition now that the railroads can finance themselves. All this has come about within a few days in a mysterious, mystical kind of way.

We prophesied when it was first presented there was no need to pass the legislation. We said it was incurring too much of an obligation on the part of the Government. But those who demanded it wanted to stand for the railroads. God knows the railroads have been the pet babies of this administration. They have gotten practically everything that they have requested. They were pampered and petted and every time they cried you poured financial milk to them out of the Treasury of the United States. No other business interest in the country has been treated better than have the railroads, and yet you wanted to pass that bill. It is not because the market has improved. It is not because the railroads can finance themselves now any better than they could 10 days ago or two months ago.

I will tell you why your leadership has abandoned the fight for the railroad funding bill. It is because the agricultural bloc or group which the President yesterday condemned, composed of Republicans and Democrats, together with the minority side of this Chamber, had made up their minds that on the railroad funding bill there should be certain amendments attached, one of which was to repeal the guaranty provision of the Cummins-Esch law, insuring cheaper freight rates, and you were afraid to face the music. And that, too, even though the President in his message yesterday said that the farmers needed a reduction in freight rates.

Where is your international funding bill? Here a few weeks ago the House passed it, and the Senate committee brought it out, giving great and inexcusable powers to the Secretary of the Treasury, so that he might compromise, might cancel, might extend, might liquidate, might swap all the indebtedness due this country to the amount of $11,000,000,000 from foreign Governments. But you have halted on that. Why? It is because you knew that the country would not stand for the kind of bill that your steering committee indorsed and which was reported out of the Finance Committee.

I read this morning with pleasure that the Finance Committee is listening to suggestions from the Democratic members of that committee and that they are about to accept the plan which has been proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], the ranking Democrat on the committee, to modify the provisions of the bill and to restrict the power proposed to be given to the Secretary of the Treasury, so that a great harm might not come to the American people by a few international bankers obtaining control—influencing and dominating the settlement of our foreign indebtedness. I hope the Finance Committee will continue to see the light; that they will acquiesce in the wishes of the American people, and that they will accept the good advice tendered to them by Senator SIMMONS and the Democratic members of the Finance Committee. It sometimes looks as though the Republicans have no statesmanship of their own. We wish to help you, and if you will follow us in these matters we shall see that you keep on the right track and really obtain results in the interests of our Government and the American people.

APPENDIX.

THE REMEDY.

It would not seem either wise or necessary suddenly to change from our present system of taxation to new and untried plans; and the evils which have been discussed can be corrected without doing anything of this sort. The necessary adjustments can readily be made by retaining most of the present taxes, but substantially reducing the rates, and supplementing the revenues by some additional taxes.

The income tax is firmly embedded in our system of taxation and the objections made are not to the principle of the tax but only to the excessively high rates. We hear much of the need of simplifying our tax laws and there is room for this. The greatest simplification that can be made is in the reduction of the rates. So long as the rates were low, there was not much difficulty in the administration of the law, even though the system was entirely new and the organization administering it unfamiliar with the operation of such a law. The complexity of the law, so far as concerns the income tax itself, has arisen largely out of the high rates which make every point that arises involve substantial amounts of money, and which means that each possible question is contested by the taxpayer and by the Government, with resulting delay in the collection of the revenue, irritation and annoyance and expense on the part of the taxpayer, and costly litigation. With moderate rates, very much of this difficulty would disappear.

The amount of revenue involved in any such reform is not nearly so great as is generally supposed.

To reduce the surtax rates to a maximum of 25 per cent, and grading the reductions through all the brackets, would mean an apparent loss of about $130,000,000 in revenue. A 20 per cent maximum rate on the same basis would involve a revenue loss of about $200,000,000. Other adjustments which should be made would probably involve an amount equal to that made in the surtax rates. This loss of revenue, however, would not be permanent, for the reduced rates would ultimately be productive of more revenue than higher rates, due to the increase in taxable transactions.

If this loss of revenue could not be met by rigid economy in expenditures, the revenue required could be raised either by placing a tax on certain specific articles, or by a low-rate general tax on a broad class of articles or transactions. Such taxes as those now imposed on automobiles and tires have been found simple and inexpensive of administration, and the collection is always substantially current; they have been steadily productive of revenue, and have been without injurious effects upon the country. In view of past experience, a general tax either of this or like character upon a broad class of articles or transactions could be readily administered; and the rate could be made sufficiently low as not to bear unduly upon any class and at the same time produce a large amount of additional revenue. By retaining the income tax with reasonable surtax rates, which in peace times ultimately should not rise above 10 per cent, taxpayers would still be required to contribute in proportion to their ability to pay; while by placing a certain amount of tax on specific articles, or classes of articles, or transactions, at so low a rate that they could readily be borne without injury, the income tax could be materially simplified, the tax laws could be more readily administered, and at the same time the needed revenues would be raised without the evil effects now resulting from the present excessive rates of taxation.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened; and (at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, December 8, 1921, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 7, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed Lord, Thou art unchangeably merciful and there is a place in Thy infinite heart for all. Forgive us our transgressions and disarm all our fears. Strengthen those who are burdened with cares. Come to any who may be in bereavement and put stars of hope into their skies. May all hearts and minds be joined together in a common purpose for the good and the well-being of our country. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ACQUISITION OF GOVERNMENT PROPERTY BY THE CITY OF CHICAGO, ILL.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, this being Calendar Wednesday and the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds having the call, there is a bill which I think was inadvertently placed on the Private Calendar, and I ask unanimous consent to have it placed on the Union Calendar in order that it may be considered to-day. It is the bill H. R. 9021.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that he ought to correct the statement that it was done inadvertently; it was not done inadvertently. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 9021, of which the Clerk will report the title, be transferred to the Union Calendar.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9021) to permit the city of Chicago to acquire real estate of the United States of America.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Let the bill be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in consideration of the payment by the city of Chicago to the United States of America of the just compensation and damages for the real estate hereinafter described, as ascertained by a jury in proceedings to condemn real estate of the United States of America, the city of Chicago is hereby authorized to acquire for street purposes by two separate condemnation proceedings all interests of the United States of America in and to the following-described parcels of real estate, viz:

(a) The east 17 feet of south 100 feet of north 133 feet of west 125 feet of east 158 feet of south quarter of east half of northeast quarter of section 30, township 38 north, range 14 east, of third principal meridian, in the city of Chicago, county of Cook, and State of Illinois; and

(b) The east 17 feet of (except south 149 feet of south 100 feet of north 133 feet of west 125 feet of east 158 feet) south quarter of east half of northeast quarter of section 30, township 38 north, range 14 east, of third principal meridian, in the city of Chicago, county of Cook, and State of Illinois.

SEC. 2. That the city of Chicago shall assume the burden of reconstruction made necessary by the taking described in section 1 hereof, which reconstruction shall be done subject to inspection by the United States Government. The cost of said reconstruction shall be deducted from the award by jury provided for in section 1 hereof and used by the city of Chicago for this purpose.

SEC. 3. That this act shall be in force from and after its passage.

With the following committee amendment, which was read:

Strike out section 2 and insert the following:

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to expend such portion of said award as in his judgment may be necessary to restore or repair Government buildings or improvements taken or damaged by reason of the taking of said parcels of real estate; and the Attorney General is hereby authorized and directed to accept service and to appear on behalf of the United States to the extent necessary to protect the interest of the United Staes in said proceedings: Provided, That in the event the amount estimated and included in the jury's award for the restoration and repair of said buildings and improvements made necessary by the taking of said parcels of real estate shall prove insufficient for said purposes the city of Chicago shall pay any difference or balance not covered by said award therefor."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have made some investigation in regard to this bill, and I think the bill is all right. But my impression is that from the precedents the bill was originally referred to the proper calendar. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to transfer it. Of course, I understand that is for the purpose of getting consideration of it to-day. I have no objection to the bill being considered to-day, but this being by unanimous consent I do not think it ought to be taken as a precedent that would control the reference of similar bills in the future.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This being Calendar Wednesday, the Clerk will call the roll of committees.

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was called.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, the bill H. R. 6263 and the bill H. R. 6874 having been taken care of in the bill H. R. 6300, a deficiency bill, I ask that those two bills be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request is agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Now, Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 8401 on the House Calendar.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8401) to transfer the custody and control of the United States customhouse wharf at Charleston, S. C., from the Treasury Department to the War Department.

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States customhouse wharf at Charleston, S. C., be, and the same is hereby, transferred from the custody and control of the Treasury Department to that of the War Department, and that all branches of the public service now using said wharf shall be permitted to continue their use of the same.

Mr. WALSH took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this is a bill to transfer the control and custody of the United States customhouse wharf at Charleston, S. C., from the Treasury Department to the War Department. This is a matter that has been agreed upon between the two departments, and in the report of the committee there is included a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, which reads as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 12, 1921.

The SPEAKER, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SIR: Your attention is invited to the wharf which was constructed in connection with the customhouse at Charleston, S. C., and paid for out of the appropriation for that building.

It is necessary almost every year to expend a large amount from the appropriation for "Repairs and preservation of public buildings" for dredging in the neighborhood of the wharf in order that vessels may approach and dock, which constitutes a heavy drain upon that appropriation. The wharf was constructed originally for the use of the Customs Service in connection with goods intended for the bonded warehouse, but its use for this purpose has practically ceased and it is used now chiefly by the War Department. The quarantine and customs services and the Navy Department make a limited use of it only. In view of these changed conditions it is believed to be advisable to transfer the control of the wharf from the Treasury to the War Department. If this were accomplished the expense for dredging would be considerably lessened, as the latter department has a dredge located in the harbor of Charleston. The Secretary of War has indicated that such transfer would be satisfactory to him.

In view of the circumstances, as above set forth, it is recommended that legislation be enacted transferring this wharf from the custody and control of the Treasury Department to that of the War Department, with the proviso that all branches of the public service now using said wharf shall be permitted to continue the same.

A draft of the legislation to accomplish this purpose is herewith transmitted.

Respectfully,

A. W. MELLON, Secretary.

This bill came before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with this recommendation from the department. We knew of no reason why the request should not be granted, as the reasons which the Treasury Department and the War Department assigned seemed to appeal to every one of the members of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and it is therefore reported unanimously for passage.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Is the property of any permanent value to the Government?

Mr. ELLIOTT. It will not be transferred from the custody of the Government.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Why should it be kept at an additional expense if it is of no use? Why not get rid of it?

Mr. ELLIOTT. This bill is only to transfer the control of it from one department to another.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Is it property that the Government has a use for now?

Mr. ELLIOTT. The Government has use for it, and it is only transferring it from one department to another.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. What is it to be used for?

Mr. ELLIOTT. It is used as a wharf for the customhouse. The Government is not giving up control of it; it is merely asking that the control be transferred from the Treasury Department of the United States Government to the War Department of the United States Government, upon the theory that the Treasury Department has no further use for it, but the War Department has and had better handle it.

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I will.

Mr. LANHAM. Is it not true that this will effect certain economies in the matter of dredging about the wharf and at the same time not restrict the use of the property by the quarantine authorities in the customs service?

Mr. ELLIOTT. It was stated to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds that the War Department could take care of this wharf more advantageously and economically than the Treasury Department could, and then, when it was transferred, that all departments of the Government could use the wharf.

Mr. LANHAM. And this bill would increase rather than restrict the use of the property at a less expense.

Mr. ELLIOTT. The gentleman is entirely correct.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. There is a subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs now considering the disposition of a number of pieces of land which have ceased to be of use to the Government. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CLARKE] raised the question whether this particular piece of ground is not one that ought to be disposed of rather than kept by the Government at considerable expense.

Mr. ELLIOTT. That question never has been raised in our committee.

Mr. TILSON. In case this authority is granted to the War Department to dispose of certain pieces of property for value, will this piece here, being transferred to the War Department, come under that provision?

Mr. ELLIOTT. This property after this bill is passed will still be the property of the United States Government, and be subject to control by Congress whenever it wants to act.

Mr. TILSON. But it will then pass under the control of the War Department, and if the War Department gets the permission which it is now seeking to dispose of certain property now belonging to the United States, no longer necessary for governmental purposes, then the Government may dispose of this property also?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I do not think it will have any authority to dispose of this property until Congress gives that authority.

Mr. TILSON. No; it would not; but if the control of the property passes now from the Treasury Department to the War Department, it will then pass within the scope of the legislation which is pending, as I understand it, for the disposition of property no longer needed by the Government.

Mr. ELLIOTT. That question has never been raised or considered in this matter.

Mr. TILSON. It would be no objection to the bill from my viewpoint.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. This transfer would not encroach upon any plans or purposes embodied in the suggestions by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON]. The matter of inquiry would proceed as to the usefulness of this wharf for the Government and its consequent retention for public purposes. If that need should be clearly defined as to its retention, we assume that the War Department would readily retain it, as the Treasury Department would. The War Department has the facilities now at its command to do the dredging and keep the wharf in proper condition for all governmental purposes, with economy and dispatch, and nothing of this other matter would be involved in any sense whatever. We could take that into account and determine that proposition upon the showing that would be made as to the need of this property for governmental purposes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I would like to have a little light on this matter. Has the War Department asked for this legislation?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I called the gentleman's attention to the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in which the Secretary of War has indicated that such a transfer would be satisfactory to him.

Mr. McKENZIE. What is the purpose of turning this over to the War Department? Is it in order that the War Department may be charged with the responsibility and the expenditure of money upon the property rather than the Treasury Department?

Mr. ELLIOTT. It was represented to us that the War Department could take care of this more advantageously and economically than the Treasury Department could, because it has facilities there to take care of the dredging and other repairs that are necessary, and that when it was done it would be used by all of the departments of the Government, and that it is satisfactory to the Secretary of War that this be done.

Mr. McKENZIE. What is the character of the property?

Mr. ELLIOTT. It is a customs wharf.

Mr. McKENZIE. In what city?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Charleston, S. C.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is not that a character of property that could be well transferred to the city of Charleston?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I know nothing about that question. All I know is what the department who is handling this put up. I do not think it would be advisable for the Government, however, to give its property to some municipality.

Mr. McKENZIE. I do not mean that the Government shall give it to a municipality.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Or to transfer the control of it.

Mr. McKENZIE. I simply want to call the attention of the House to the fact that we have been for almost a year trying to get an inventory of the nearly innumerable tracts of land under the control of the War Department. We have recently prepared a report, which will be presented to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and reported to this House in the very near future, in which we try to make an inventory of the real estate owned by the War Department, and the scores of tracts of land that the War Department has notified us they have no further military use for, which they would like to dispose of by sale, transfer, or turning them over to some other governmental activity. The only thing I have in my mind is whether it is possible that we are taking on another tract of land to add to this list that we already have.

Mr. ELLIOTT. This is a horse that we already have in the stable, and we are merely taking him out of one door and putting him into another. The Government owns it all.

Mr. McKENZIE. I would say to the gentleman from Indiana that the War stable is so full of horses now that we can not get any more in, and we want to get some of them out.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. In addition to what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ELLIOTT] handling the bill has said, I call attention to the fact that the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury advised the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds that this wharf is now being used chiefly by the War Department. It was originally erected for use in connection with goods intended for the bonded warehouse belonging to the customs service in the Treasury Department. However, the dredging in the water adjoining this wharf is connected with some expense, and the War Department has already the apparatus and machinery there for dredging the harbor at Charleston.

Mr. STAFFORD. And in that particular, if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ELLIOTT] will yield, may I ask the gentleman whether the hearings disclose anything as to the expense of dredging, whether it was incurred by the Treasury through private contractors or whether the Secretary of the Treasury did not have at his command the use of the Government dredge?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I do not remember that that question was gone into very fully, but the recommendation that was made to the committee was that the Treasury Department was not in position to do this dredging as economically as the War Department was, because the War Department was prepared to do the work.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reading the letter of the Secretary it would appear the Secretary of the Treasury did not have any claim upon the Government dredge operated by the War Department for keeping this wharf in condition and was obliged to call for bids from private contractors. If the Secretary of the Treasury had the right to call upon the War Department for the use of the War Department's dredge there would be no pressing need for this bill.

Mr. McKENZIE. The statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin has raised another very interesting question in regard to this matter. If the Treasury Department is to retain the warehouse that much at least is saved to the War Department, because we have warehouses to burn—we can not sell them—in charge of the War Department now, but here is the point: If the warehouse is to be used by the Treasury Department and then you are going to unload onto the War Department all the expense of the dredging and the keeping of that wharf in repair for the benefit of the Treasury Department, it seems to me it is unfair to the War Department.

Mr. STAFFORD. It unloads on the War Department something it has not any call for.

Mr. ELLIOTT. The War Department is not making any complaint about this.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. I understand this warehouse is to remain in the Treasury Department and the wharf is to be kept in order by the War Department?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. In other words, you are putting on the War Department the upkeep of the wharf as a part of the Military Establishment of the United States?

Mr. ELLIOTT. But the War Department is not making any complaint about this.

Mr. MILLER. Is the Secretary of War advised of the situation?

Mr. ELLIOTT. If the Secretary of the Treasury tells the truth, he is; he says he has advised him, and that he is satisfied to let it go.

Mr. MILLER. Have you any communication from the Secretary of War in regard to this?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Nothing except the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MILLER. You want to wish it on the War Department?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I do not want to wish it on anybody.

Mr. MILLER. Nobody cares anything about it, and you do not care about it.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I will say this is of no importance to me except as a citizen of the United States, but as a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I will say that they came before our committee with a reasonable proposition, and we thrashed it out, and the committee unanimously voted to report this bill for passage. And so far as all this trouble you are kicking up about the War Department is concerned, I would say this, that the War Department is always able to take care of itself. It knows this bill is in here. The Secretary of the Treasury says he has consulted with the Secretary of War, and nobody in the War Department has raised any question about it, nor anybody else except a few fellows who would like to act as guardian ad litem for the War Department.

Mr. MILLER. Was anybody there from the War Department to help in this thrashing process?

Mr. ELLIOTT. There was not anybody there from the War Department that I remember.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield.

Mr. MANN. Has this ever been referred to the Secretary of War for his opinion?

Mr. ELLIOTT. The Secretary of War reported he had taken it up. That is as much as I know about it.

Mr. MANN. Has the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds ever referred to the Secretary of War the bill transferring property to the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois I am not the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. What the chairman may have done in the way of referring this to the Secretary of War I do not know.

Mr. MANN. But there is no report from the Secretary of War, so far as you know?

Mr. ELLIOTT. No; nothing except the letter I have referred to.

Mr. MANN. I take it that the real reason for this bill is a form of appropriation made by Congress, and that in order for the Treasury Department to expend money in the protection of this wharf it is necessary to secure an appropriation from the Congress covered in the appropriation for repairs of public buildings and grounds. If the War Department operates a dredge there under the present practice, that is paid out of the lump-sum appropriation for rivers and harbors and does not come under the scrutiny of any appropriation committee of this House. Is not that the real reason for this?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I am not advised as to whether it is or not.

Mr. MANN. I can advise the gentleman that that is the real reason. It is to avoid the necessity of asking Congress for an appropriation to dredge or protect this wharf. That is the real reason. Wherever a department can get hold of power to expend money without submitting a request to Congress they want that power always.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Well, gentlemen, so far as this bill is concerned, I have not had any reason put up to me so far that would change my mind. I voted to report this bill out for passage, and so far as I am concerned I will vote for its passage in the House. The War Department is using this wharf. Everybody seems to be satisfied with it.

Mr. KING. What are they using it for?

Mr. ELLIOTT. For a dock. I suggest that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] might use some of his time at this time, if he wishes. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I may say that I am somewhat grieved at this manifestation of a lack of confidence in the Secretary of the Treasury on the part of some of the majority Members. In his letter the Secretary very clearly outlines that the wharf is now being used liberally by the War Department, and that the Secretary of War has indicated that the transfer would be satisfactory to him. It would seem that the Secretaries of the two departments concerned are thoroughly in accord with reference to the desirability of the enactment of this measure, and those two wise men of the east having put their heads together and come to a common decision in the matter, I see no reason for any Republican contention that the bill should not pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ELLIOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Has the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds any further business?

OLD SUBTREASURY, SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 5700, Union Calendar, No. 131, a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the old Subtreasury property at San Francisco, Calif.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read the title, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5700) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the old Subtreasury property at San Francisco, Calif.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar, and the House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for its consideration. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5700, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5700, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to sell to the highest bidder, at public or private sale, the old Subtreasury property, located on the north side of Commercial Street about 60 feet west of Montgomery Street, and known as 608 Commercial Street, San Francisco, Calif., in such manner and upon such terms as he may deem to be to the best interests of the United States; to convey such property to the purchaser thereof by the usual quitclaim deed, and to deposit the proceeds of such sale in the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill that was introduced by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. He is thoroughly conversant with the facts concerning it, and I yield to the gentleman 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for 20 minutes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2708. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer without charge certain surplus material of the War Department to the American Relief Administration in Russia.

SALE OF OLD SUBTREASURY PROPERTY, SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the old Subtreasury Building in San Francisco is located on Commercial Street, which is rather a narrow street in comparison with the other streets of the city. It was bought by the Government in 1854. The house and site cost something like $230,000. During the earthquake and fire of 1906 this was the only building that the Federal Government owned at that time that was burned, and it was burned practically to the ground. The first story and basement of the building at that time were used as a subtreasury. They had a few other Federal offices in the upper stories, the land office, notably; that is, the quarters of the surveyor general of California and of the receiver and register of the Land Office. When the building was burned it was found inadvisable to attempt to do more than put a roof over it and allow it to be used for a subtreasury building for the time being. The building was so used, but eventually the Subtreasury was moved into a new and substantial building at the corner of Sansome and Pine Streets. The building on Commercial Street remained idle for quite a length of time. Later on it was turned over to the War Department for a little while, and I think they had their engineers in there temporarily. Then it was turned over to the Navy Department for a little while, and they retained control for a few months. But eventually none of the Government officers found quarters there, and it has been rented to a private concern since January of this year. The Secretary of the Treasury in the meantime recommended that the building be sold and that the money be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. This bill, if enacted into law, would authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell at private sale, on any terms that might suit him, property belonging to the Government of the United States. Is that a good thing to do in time of peace, when there is no special hurry, to allow any man to sell public property at private sale in his discretion?

Mr. KAHN. Well, the Secretary of the Treasury evidently seems to think that possibly he can get a better price for it at private sale than by submitting it at public sale. But, of course, that is all within the option of the Secretary, and he does not have to accept the figure offered at private sale unless it is thoroughly agreeable to him.

Mr. Chairman, I think I have stated the matter pretty thoroughly. I yield back the balance of my time.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

SALE OF OLD SUBTREASURY PROPERTY, SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] wish to use any time?

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to reinforce some of the statements which have been made by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. I may say with reference to this bill, in contrast with the one which has just passed, that in this measure there is evident accord between the military and financial interests of the Government, for the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is sponsoring this measure.

This building is now practically useless to the Government. It was constructed in 1854. It was then a four-story building. Through fire and earthquake it has been so destroyed that the reconstruction of it permitted only a one-story building.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LANHAM. I will.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman advise the committee, so that there may be no doubt about it, as to the approximate size of the lot upon which this building is located?

Mr. LANHAM. I think that is set forth in the report.

Mr. RAKER. It may be in the original report, but it is not printed.

Mr. KAHN. I think the building is about 30 feet front by about 70 feet in depth.

Mr. LANHAM. And I understand there is no ground in addition to that which the building occupies.

Mr. KAHN. No; none whatever.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. LANHAM. I will.

Mr. RAKER. What is the gentleman's view as to lines 9, 10, and 11, which authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell this property at private sale without public auction?

Mr. LANHAM. I should like to answer that question by making one or two prefatory statements.

When this building was originally constructed it was in the heart of the city; that is, of the business section. Since 1854 the trend of commercial construction has been in a different direction, and this building has been left down in this section which is not now so frequented, practically isolated and alone in so far as commercial purposes are concerned. Added to this element of shrinking value is the destruction which I have mentioned, that has come from the fire and the earthquake, so that we have a one-story building in a poor state of repair where formerly there was a handsome four-story structure. Consequently, the demand for this building is not what it once was. It offers no specially attractive inducement to any commercial enterprise. It is not desired by any of the Government departments and not desirable for any of the proper functions of those departments. They have all signified their willingness to permit this building to be sold, by reason of the fact that it does not meet the requirements of any Government enterprise in that city. Accordingly, the building has been rented for $85 a month, which seems all that it will yield. Since it serves no useful purpose for the Government, if an advantageous sale could be had it would really be a benefit to the Government. I think that the provision for private sale is included in the bill by design. The lines to which the gentleman from California has referred are placed in the bill advisedly, and the Secretary of the Treasury is of the opinion that likely a much more advantageous sale of this particular property may be had privately than by public auction. And, as stated in the report, the Government may expect to obtain about $20,000 for this structure at private sale, and the consensus of opinion seems to be that that is all the building is worth. Since it is no longer necessary for governmental purposes, since it is in a part of the city where property is not worth what it once was, since the building has been practically destroyed and is now a one-story structure badly in need of repair, it seems that economy and expediency and the best interests of the Government are all conserved by authorizing the disposition of it at private sale, which, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, would probably yield a larger sum than by public auction. The Secretary is left the option as to the method and, under the terms of the bill, the sale may be either public or private.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. LANHAM. I will.

Mr. RAKER. I have been quite impressed with the gentleman's story of San Francisco, and I have just wondered when it was that the business interests moved from Montgomery Street.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, not having had the pleasure of visiting California or the Golden Gate City, but having heard their praises sung morning, noon, and night by the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], I refer him to another distinguished son of that State, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. KAHN], who, together with the Secretary of the Treasury, is sponsor for the statement that the building is not now so advantageously situated commercially as it once was.

Mr. RAKER. What I wish to know is when the Secretary of the Treasury visited San Francisco and came to the conclusion that Montgomery Street was out of the business center of San Francisco?

Mr. LANHAM. I do not know just when that visit was made.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. This section of the city has gone down materially, and a new Subtreasury building was put up at the corner of Montgomery and Pine Streets, which is as fine a public building as there is in this country.

Mr. LANHAM. And that supersedes this old building and makes it no longer necessary.

Mr. KAHN. Exactly so. This building was occupied for a little time after the fire by the War Department. Then they had no further use for it. Then it was occupied for a little time by the Navy Department. Then they had no further use for it. For quite a while it was entirely empty. Then it was found that they could get a private concern to pay $80 a month rent for it, and the building is now occupied by that private concern.

Mr. LANHAM. There is now no governmental activity in the city of San Francisco which desires to use this building?

Mr. KAHN. No; I think the report of the committee shows that every time a public activity was asked about the building the Treasury officials were told that they would have to expend a great amount of money to reconstruct the building, and they all refused to do it.

Mr. LANHAM. May I ask the gentleman, who is thoroughly familiar with the physical property and its environment, if in his judgment and from his knowledge of the facts a sale for $20,000 would be an advantageous sale for the Government?

Mr. KAHN. I think it would.

Mr. LANHAM. I will ask the gentleman, further, if it is not probable that that is the approximate sum for which the building will be sold?

Mr. KAHN. I have been told or was informed in a letter or it was intimated that that is the fact, although I did not make any investigation. But I know that property in that section where this property is situated is not bringing a great deal of money.

Mr. LANHAM. The statement is made in the report also that it would cost $5,000 to repair this 1-story structure so that it could be used by any governmental activity.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman from Texas yield for me to ask a question of the gentleman from California?

Mr. LANHAM. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from California whether there are any governmental activities in San Francisco that are in rented quarters and calling for additional governmental space?

Mr. KAHN. They are not calling for additional space. I have an idea that there are a few in rented quarters, but it would cost so much to fit up this building for their use for their purpose that it would be cheaper to get rid of it; they are now nearer, in the buildings they occupy, to the business center of San Francisco, so that the business men can much easier get in touch with them.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is quite well acquainted with the policy of the Government; that when one governmental building is no longer large enough to carry on the activity of the Government, for the Government to retain it and transfer it to some other department of governmental activity. I noticed in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury he says that at this time it is not desired to be used by any department, implying that in the future they may have occasion to use the property, and I question whether it might not be well to hold it rather than to sell it at a sacrifice price?

Mr. LANHAM. In reply to the gentleman let me say that the Secretary of the Treasury seems to have gone fully into that matter, and he can see no reasonable immediate prospect for its use by any branch of the Government.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question and a short statement?

Mr. LANHAM. I will.

Mr. RAKER. Of course, where Government property is not needed and you can get a fair value for it, it ought to be sold. I think there should be no objection to this bill. But I want some information, and my colleague has not answered the question. I am asking now when it was that the great business interests on Montgomery Street ceased or changed?

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that my familiarity with California is almost solely along esthetic lines and has been acquired from reading and from eating its delicious fruit and hearing about its balm and sunshine, I will yield for an answer to this very material question to my friend from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, Commercial Street, where this building is located, has been out of the business center of San Francisco for the last 35 or 40 years.

When you go down Montgomery Street from Commercial Street to California Street, some blocks farther down, you get into the wholesale business of the city and among the banks and insurance offices.

Mr. RAKER. How far is Commercial Street north——

Mr. KAHN. Far enough to have gone out of the business center of the city; it is no longer a portion of the business section of San Francisco, and any man who knows San Francisco ought not to ask the question. [Laughter.]

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I will.

Mr. WINGO. What kind of business surrounds this property?

Mr. LANHAM. That also being a material fact, I refer the answer to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. They are small buildings.

Mr. WINGO. What kind of business is next door to this building?

Mr. KAHN. I do not think there is anything next door to it, but the buildings around there are small because it is a very small, narrow street.

Mr. WINGO. Occupied by fruit stands or wholesale warehouses, or what?

Mr. KAHN. It is very near Kearny Street, much nearer Kearny Street than Montgomery Street; Kearny Street near this building contains shooting galleries and retail stores of various kinds.

Mr. WINGO. Is it in the suburban retail district?

Mr. KAHN. No; it is not in the retail district of the city.

Mr. WINGO. It is not in the main retail district, but small retail shops.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. How many square feet are there in this site?

Mr. KAHN. About 21,000 square feet; possibly 25,000 square feet.

Mr. WINGO. What does property there bring a foot? Is there any proof on that?

Mr. KAHN. No; but they told me that they probably could get $20,000 for it, and I consider that that is a very fair price.

Mr. WINGO. Is it a corner lot?

Mr. KAHN. No; it is an interior lot.

Mr. WINGO. Thirty feet wide and seventy feet deep.

Mr. KAHN. I think that is it. It may be only 25 feet wide.

Mr. WINGO. That is in the gentleman's district?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. I hope my distinguished colleague from California took no offense at anything I said with respect to an inquiry about the great city of San Francisco and all of its surroundings.

Mr. KAHN. Oh, no; I never take any offense at anything the gentleman says.

Mr. RAKER. Because my observation some six months ago——

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from California yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Has the gentleman from California ever been in San Francisco?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, that might be either a pertinent or an impertinent inquiry. Of course, I know the gentleman did not mean to be impertinent. About this property, both east and west, north and south, there is one of the greatest developed cities in the United States, if not in the world, radiating from this general territory. Of course, the building may not be worth much, and I know that the desire of my distinguished friend from California is that the Government get not what the building is worth, for you might as well throw that into the bay, but what the ground is worth, to put a 15 or 20 story building on.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. How many 15 or 20 story buildings are there on that block?

Mr. RAKER. Oh, there are so many in San Francisco that I get dizzy looking at them, and, therefore, I suppose that they would put a 15 or 20 story building on this lot.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, this resolves itself into a proposition of this character. Here is a piece of property estimated to be worth $20,000. The Secretary of the Treasury is of the opinion that he can get that sum, or approximately that, for it. The building, it seems, is practically worthless. It would require, according to the testimony, $5,000 to place it in repair for use, which is not now desired. There is no reasonable prospect that it will soon be desired for use by any branch of the Government. The matter resolves itself into a proposition of whether it is wiser under these circumstances for the Government to sell for $20,000 a piece of property which it would require $5,000 to put in repair, which to-day is being leased for a rental of $85 per month and with no assurance of a permanent lease at that price.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What reason can the gentleman give for disposing of Government property at private sale in the time of peace?

Mr. LANHAM. The only reason that I can assign is the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury is of the opinion that he can make a more advantageous sale in that way than at public auction.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But one could say that about any sale. If an individual can express the opinion that he can get more money at private sale than at public sale, one could get that opinion every day. It does not justify the sale of this at private sale.

Mr. LANHAM. My observation has been that private sales frequently yield much larger returns than sales at public auction.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman know of any city contracts for doing work in the gentleman's own district where it is given into the hands of any one man to let the contract on private terms?

Mr. LANHAM. I would say that municipal contracts are usually let to the lowest bidder, while here we are seeking to get the highest bidder.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I know, but there is a public bidding, and the city gets the best terms it can at public bidding. The gentleman does not know of any municipality in the United States that ever disposes of a contract of that kind and hands out the money of the people or the country unless there has been a bidding for an opportunity to do the work.

Mr. LANHAM. I would say to the gentleman that I can not quite see the analogy between a contract made by a municipality and a sale of property by the Government.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But the sale is a contract of sale and it is completed by handing over the purchase money. The principle is identical. The Government ought not to sell its property at private sale.

Mr. LANHAM. The Government is doing that now in many instances, and we are not departing very much from precedent in that respect. I am a member of the committee, and I confess that I have deferred to the wishes and judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury. He is of the opinion that he can make a better sale according to the terms of this bill, and it was upon his recommendation and at his suggestion that this language was incorporated in this measure.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Has it not sometimes been the practice for the Treasury Department to advertise for the sale of property and receive bids, which might not be very high, and then to sell the property to somebody else who would offer a considerably higher sum than the bids submitted?

Mr. LANHAM. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion. I do not think this language would interfere with a proceeding of that kind.

Mr. MANN. I took it that that was the reason for the verbiage here. It quite frequently happens that on receiving bids for the sale of property nobody bids very high because they do not know whether they will get it or not, but when it is agitated and bids are published, then some one else comes along who is willing to pay a substantially higher price.

Mr. LANHAM. That is correct, and I thank the distinguished gentleman for his contribution. This bill, I think, is so worded as to give the proper latitude to the Secretary of the Treasury in disposing of this property.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. I would say further to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois that where this property is located on Commercial Street—a very narrow street with small houses upon it—the possibility is that they could arrange a combination among a few men to keep down the price; but the Secretary of the Treasury might get an offer from some other man very much in excess of what these bidders would offer; and I presume that is what he had in mind when he offered that language.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How would this other man know anything about this sale if it was not made public?

Mr. KAHN. Of course, if it were made public he would bid at the public sale, and if he were allowed to accept a private bid he would probably get a very much higher bid than the one he got in the public sale.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Would that not require a publication of a notice of sale of Government property, not in the discretion of any man but an absolutely mandatory statute?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I would like to ask the gentleman this question, namely, If he knows whether or not they have any particular purchaser in view now?

Mr. KAHN. I think they have in mind possibly the occupants of the building. Now, I do not know, because I have not spoken about this property to anybody; but I would rather imagine that the Secretary of the Treasury might have in view the people who occupy the building at this time, and they might offer more than would be offered at public sale.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I apprehended that, because in view of the estimate of the possible purchase price I assume that it would necessarily be after conference with some prospective purchaser.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, pursuant to the provision of an act passed by Congress and approved March 4, 1921, all "journals, magazines, and periodicals" of the departments of the Government died on the 1st day of December. Inasmuch as that situation has brought about considerable confusion, I ask permission to address the House for the time allotted to me outside of the subject under discussion. If there is no objection, I want to make a statement of the situation with reference to Federal printing.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. May I inquire the subject matter about which the gentleman wishes to talk?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. About the matter of suspending the printing of Government "journals, magazines, and periodicals," which went into effect December 1, last, and to endeavor to clarify the situation a little bit, for the reason that in my opinion a misunderstanding exists between the heads of the departments and the Public Printer as to just what shall be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to speak out of order. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, ever since I have had the honor to be a Member of Congress, now about nine years, I have given some attention to waste in Government Printing. I remember when I first came to Congress the chairman of the Committee on Printing was Mr. Barnhart, of Indiana, who labored long and hard in an effort to recodify and bring down to date and improve the laws relative to public printing and binding. He has been succeeded by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KIESS], who works along the same line. In the Senate, as chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing, Senator SMOOT, and later Senator MOSES in the same capacity, have worked hard for many hours, and with the aid of all of the members of the Joint Committee, have managed to stop the printing of a large number of Government magazines, newspapers, and periodicals, and to secure from Congress the right for the Joint Committee on Printing to exercise supervision over the publication of bulletins and miscellaneous Government publications. Governmental printing of all kinds, in my opinion, in the last 10 years has amounted to a tremendous waste and a public scandal. Everybody knows that when a man feels like writing and gets hold of type and a printing press and some paper he will write and print, even if nobody reads his effusion. The departments have had the type, Congress has furnished the paper, and the bureaus have enlarged about every bulletin that possibly could be changed, into a magazine, a newspaper, or a periodical—nearly all without authority of law. Hence our present problems.

Before discussing the magazines and regular publications, I call attention to a proposed farmers' bulletin. I have here the manuscript. The reason that it came before the Joint Committee on Printing is because the Public Printer asked the committee to decide whether it was "waste in public printing." I defy any 10 Congressmen to say that the issuance of this bulletin would not be waste of the first magnitude.

The Department of Agriculture ordered 3,000 copies of it. Mind you, this is not a regular publication to come out weekly and monthly, of the kind the law suspended, but this is a farmers' bulletin to be issued under the authority of an act of Congress, and it would have been printed if the Public Printer had not had his eye open.

This bulletin is entitled "The labor and leisure year of the farmer and his wife. A graphic method of presenting the distribution of farm labor." It has been prepared by two experts of the department, one in the office of Farm Management and Farm Economics and one in the office of Home Management Studies of the States Relations Service.

Those are two bureaus designed to render assistance and to furnish information to the farmers and their wives. In their desire to be of use, in the name of the United States, they have experted two farmers and two wives of farmers. They induced a farmer and his wife out in Illinois and another farmer and his wife in Pennsylvania to keep tables as to how they spent their working time and leisure time for one year, and then these two experts got busy and wrote this pamphlet and drew these pictures, tables, and diagrams. Kindly note Table 1, a zigzag chart in three or four or five colors, red, blue, pink, yellow, and green, showing how the two farmers and their two wives devoted their working time and their leisure time; and this table here—No. 2—shows the distribution of this time, according to the length of the working day, for one family; and here is the distribution of days, according to the length of the working day, for the other family. These charts show by a dark line the increase of the work hours as the months go on toward summer time, and showing the decrease later as winter approaches. How astonishing! Does any farmer need a bulletin to show him that as the days get longer the two farmers and wives are inclined to have a little bit longer working-day?

A MEMBER. Do they have daylight saving there?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, now, I presume that will be the subject of a special expert bulletin, with a new series of illustrated charts.

This table, which I will call No. 7, shows that as the days get shorter, toward October, they work a little less each day. Here is another of similar order, and here is another one [indicating]. Wait until you get down to the real nut of this expert analysis. I will quote from the manuscript of the bulletin itself. Let us see what leisure time meant for these four people. I quote:

> Leisure time was used in reading, visiting, attending entertainments and church, pleasure drives, and writing letters of friendship.

That constitutes the leisure time of the farmer.

Mr. DUNBAR. What objection has the gentleman to offer to a person so devoting his time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. None whatever; but why write a book about it? It says further:

> Under "personal" was listed dressing, naps, resting, illness, attending funerals, and such other personal occupations as could not be considered recreation.

Now, my friends, my reason for quoting from that bulletin is this: That not only myself but other members of the very compact Committee on Printing of this House, consisting of three Members—the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KIESS], the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON], and myself—are being criticized and are receiving almost more mail than we can look at because of the fact that we are accused of throttling Government printing. We do not desire to eliminate a single useful farmers' bulletin or a desirable publication of any kind, and we do not intend to. We do not propose to cut off a single desirable Labor Department publication that is issued within the law, or the necessary publications of any other department. But we do not want any one department to insist or to intimate that we are particularly and personally—every one of us or any one of us—after any particular publication. Not so. We are not "after" crop reports, seed reports, health reports, labor reports; but we are after such publications as this particular bulletin. If I am any judge, there is not one farmer in a million who wants such a segregation of his work time and play time or who has time to waste in reading charts and tables of the segregation of other people's time. Such a publication, particularly with a chart in colors, is a wanton waste of public money, in my opinion, and so long as I am on the committee it never will be permitted. [Applause.]

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman point out some other publications such as the one issued by the Department of Commerce, which, in my opinion, is practically useless?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; but "uselessness" has degrees of meaning. I think the one the gentleman has in mind is actually authorized by law. Since Congress gave this committee authority three years ago to remedy any "neglect, delay, duplication, or waste in public printing and binding" we have managed to cut off 111 publications at a saving of easily $1,200,000 a year. [Applause.] And we have now reached a point where they are either all dead or supposed to be dead, gasping hard in the last throes.

Before my time expires I want to show you an interpretation of the law under which, I think, if followed by the Secretaries of the departments, will permit within reasonable bounds the continuation of those publications which are entitled to continue without legislation from Congress.

But let us look at one or two more samples. Here is a publication called "The Sketching Board," issued in 1921 by the engineer school at Camp Humphreys in the number of 1,000 copies at a cost of $1,101.23. Now, my friends, this is nothing else than a little souvenir album showing pictures of officers and buildings, with some of the officers on horseback.

A MEMBER. On white horses? [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes. Perhaps so, but white elephants for the United States Government; that is sure. Now, that is only one sample. Recently I had a sample of 5,000 Christmas cards sent out by recruiting officers—just Christmas cards; that is all. It was a fraud and a bunco to call it printing required for the recruiting service.

Here is another one. This, in my opinion, comes under the guise of publications of the kind that Congress has ordered suspended. It is entitled "The United States Shipping Board Daily Bulletin"; it is the size of a telephone directory and is issued every day in the year and sold at $1 a copy. That sprang up in the Navy Department during the war, and was intended to contain reports of the movements of ships all over the world which was based on information gained by our radio service.

Mr. KING. Was not that of value to the people and valuable to the Shipping Board?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; it is of value of course. But if its particular purpose is to aid commercial shipping, why should the Federal Government carry it on at a very considerable loss? And even if it did have value and had a right to be printed, why, when it was authorized to be printed by the Navy Department, should it be transferred without any authority of any kind to the United States Shipping Board? Has any one any authority? Do the acts of Congress mean anything? That is what I am asking.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. What is the date of issue?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. November 2, 1921.

Mr. WALSH. Did we not cut off the publication of that bulletin by the Navy Department in the deficiency bill passed in the last session of Congress?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; I think so; a considerable time before adjournment.

Mr. WALSH. How comes it that the Shipping Board is publishing it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. You can search me. I have devoted all the time I could spare in an effort to justify certain of these publications, and about all that I get for it is abuse.

The issue printed for Monday, September 19, 1921, has pasted on the cover, the following notice:

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

This bulletin having been transferred from the Navy Department to the United States Shipping Board, the latter will continue to publish it as heretofore.

That is all I know about it.

Mr. WALSH. There is a very strong prohibition carried in the appropriation bill against the Shipping Board or other departments carrying on other publications unless they are authorized by law. We have stopped the Navy Department, and I would like to know how the Shipping Board is publishing it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will say to the gentleman that if we should have any luck at all there will not be any more of it, unless the shipping interests of the country come in and sustain it, or unless it is set up in the Department of Commerce by law and by arrangement with the shipping interests. A while ago it had about 300 paid subscribers at 50 cents a copy, and was estimated to the joint committee last winter as costing the Government about $130,000 a year. We directed the department to raise the price to $1 a copy in the hope of making it pay.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Might it not have some value to the Shipping Board, which is a Government agency?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes, of course; but it is one of the things that go into the general aggregate that will make the Shipping Board lose millions of dollars a year.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The benefit accruing to the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation might necessarily be charged to those agencies.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes. As to that point, let me admit frankly that each and every one of these Government publications, even though it was a publication that used to exist out here at St. Elizabeths Insane Asylum, has some value; but whether the value is of sufficient importance to our people to warrant its printing and distribution by the Federal Government, with or without the authority of Congress, I am not able to say. Mind you, some of the most costly ones have extremely limited circulations.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. Of course, if the Shipping Board is the owner of half the ships in the United States, it should have an appropriation to carry on that publication.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It should not be done without authority from the Congress of the United States.

Mr. EDMONDS. Undoubtedly the Shipping Board has that authority.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman know of any authority that the Shipping Board has to issue the bulletin and sell it at a dollar a copy?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I do not, except that the Navy Department began publishing it, and the joint committee insisted that if it was to continue they must charge enough to make this thing pay, without any thought of the cost of the radiograms at all or cost of overhead charges.

Mr. EDMONDS. The Shipping Board has authority to operate its ships, and if this is necessary to operate their ships it would be necessary to publish it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Somebody asked me a moment ago about the commerce reports. They were issued daily, pursuant to law, with more or less efficiency, and some time ago they consolidated the daily information they desired to publish into a weekly edition.

Mr. KING. Is that the document that comes to our desks once a week?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think so. That is under date of November 14.

Mr. KING. Has the Congress given them authority to issue them in colors?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No. It is not in colors. It has had colored covers, but they have been dropped.

Mr. KING. Why can not that be stopped? Of what use is it except to a few people?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Let me give a complete answer to the whole proposition by making a statement. In an effort to find out just what to do, when we found the time approaching on December 1 that these publications should be suspended, a resolution was passed by unanimous consent in the Senate which provided that the Joint Committee on Printing should have the say so, willy-nilly, thumbs up or thumbs down, as to which of these publications should continue to be printed and which should not. That resolution was messaged over to the House and referred to the House Committee on Printing. In the House committee there was a tendency at first to adopt it in that form, but I took the stand that it was too severe a task for a little committee of three Senators and three Representatives to undertake to say what was fish and what was flesh in governmental printing, or to decide what was food for one man and poison for another, especially as that committee has a great deal of everyday routine work to do. So then it was proposed to extend the time another three months, and let all of the publications continue for this time. Congress had already done that on three occasions in the last three years, and I took the attitude that each and every time we delayed the cutting off of these publications we just weakened ourselves that much more and made it just that much harder to cut them all off, and that if we sat tight and let them all die on December 1 we would find it much easier to breathe the breath of life into those which were properly entitled to exist than we would find it to fight all of those in existence whether they had a right to exist or not. [Applause.] I filed a minority report opposing the extension and quoting the various laws and regulations, which you will find printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of November 23 last.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EDMONDS. Is it intended to stop the publication of the Commerce Reports?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; it is not. I have said it has the sanction of an act of Congress. It is one of the actually legitimate publications.

Mr. EDMONDS. I agree with the gentleman that this weekly bulletin that they get out now is very valuable and ought to be continued.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is some value to every one of them, even the little Alaska Engineering Magazine, formerly published in far-off Anchorage, where they have few people and little news. Even if it filled its columns with such statements as the fact that Mr. and Mrs. John Henry Brown had arrived in Anchorage from the States to work on the Government railway and had taken a house on Third Street, still it was of some value; but was it of enough value to all of the people of the United States to justify us in keeping it going at Government expense? It was not. [Applause.]

Mr. KING. It was not of sufficient importance to tax the entire people of the United States to operate it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washingon. Of course not, and that applies to dozens and dozens of these publications that sprang up and flourished like green bay trees until your committee became incensed and cut down 111 of them at one fell swoop. And now—under direct instructions of Congress itself—all are down and out if they persist in trying to live as newspapers and magazines, but not if they will just keep within the law.

Another thing your committee did was to insist that all advertising matter should be cut out. And, by the way, that was then and is now the law. Some of the departments fought that. They wanted to continue these publications and as a side line to take in money for advertisements in competition with the general advertising business of the United States.

How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington has 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Let me say here in passing that the general law governing the public printing and binding and distribution of public documents was approved on January 12, 1895. That was a good many years ago. Except for a few amendments, that law has never been corrected and brought down to date since that time. In the last Congress the House passed a revised printing bill and sent it over to the Senate where it was not passed, and I sincerely hope that this Congress will find time to bring the printing laws down to date so that we may all know where we stand.

In regard to these publications that were discontinued on December 1 last, my opinion is that under this law—the statute of 1895—as defined by the rules of the Joint Committee, there is already sufficient authority for certain of them to live. Under that act the Secretary of any department may cause to be printed at the Government Printing Office, to the number of 1,000 copies, any report, publication, or document; but the sundry civil act, approved March 4, 1921, provides that such publications shall be certified in writing to the Public Printer by the respective heads or chiefs thereof to be necessary to conduct the ordinary and routine business required by law of such executive departments or Government establishments, and except such reports, monographs, bulletins, or other publications as are authorized by law or specifically provided for in appropriations herein; all other printing required or deemed necessary or desirable by heads of executive departments or other Government establishments or offices or bureaus thereof shall be done only as Congress shall from time to time authorize. (41 Stats., p. 1430.)

That is up to 1,000 copies, with the exception of the Department of Agriculture, which in respect to the Crop Reporter and certain other reports and bulletins may issue as many as the Secretary of that department thinks requisite. Now, with that law, until we are ready to revise the printing law, I can not see that Congress needs again to adopt any temporary measure.

There is a great demand on the part of some that the Labor Review be continued. That, so far as I can learn, is the only publication coming out of the Department of Labor, and, in my opinion, it can be printed for free distribution up to the number of 1,000 copies, so long as it consists of statistical matter and reports and not of book reviews and editorials.

Mr. Chairman, here are the exact words of a paragraph in section 89 of the printing act of 1895, which covers the situation, I think:

> No report, publication, or document shall be printed in excess of 1,000 of each in any one fiscal year without authorization therefor by Congress.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. What will the total printing expenses of the United States Government aggregate in a year?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does the gentleman mean the white paper, letter paper, and everything else?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. The printing expenses of the departments?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I can not say offhand, but it is a very large sum. I estimate that we have saved in one year's time $1,200,000 or $1,400,000 on one batch of publications alone, and to date this year we saved another half million on other discontinuations, and with the suspension of the particular ones that died on December 1, that ought to be suspended, we will save another half million or so. [Applause.] These represent savings, annually. We saved last spring exactly $684,000 on contracts for print paper. It takes labor, effort, and persistence to save a few million for Uncle Sam these days, but it can be done, has been done, and is being done at the printing end. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. With pleasure.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman said that publications could be continued if they contained statistics and not editorials.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. When the gentleman uses the word "editorial," does he mean that there shall be no comments as to what the statistics mean?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, no.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No interpretation of them at all?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, no; I do not mean that. Tables have to be interpreted and explained, of course. But when a publication of the Government takes a stand for or against the League of Nations, or for or against reclamation, or for or against the open shop, or for or against any other open, debatable question, I contend that such statements are editorial and not a proper function of the Government.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is not in relation to any statistics.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is what I mean by editorials. Now, it is interesting to note that the Department of Agriculture has had a very large number of these publications, and that this department is asking very earnestly for the continuation of several of them, and it is now proposed to combine three or four of them into one. The department offers to do this only after the screws are on, mind you, and it is worthy of note that about two years ago when we were pressing this question the Department of Agriculture did combine two or three—consolidated something into the Seed Reporter or Crop Reporter—and I have never yet found a living soul anywhere that has ever missed those that were dropped out of the publications of the Agricultural Department.

In conclusion, let me say that all of these publications started in good faith. Their editors are enthusiasts. Each is strong for his line of work. No one wants his paper to die. I sympathize with each one. It is not the fault of any particular one that this whole thing got out of bounds and ran wild. All hands will feel better when a readjustment is finally made. [Applause.]

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 35 minutes.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to proceed out of order for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, on this subject of printing the gentleman from Washington has given you a good deal of very valuable information, and I will state he is one of the most alert members of that committee from either end of the Capitol. I want to add a few words to what has been said and to state exactly what the status is from the legal standpoint.

This action was taken by Congress on June 5, 1920, and section 4 of the sundry civil bill reads as follows:

> SEC. 4. Any journal, magazine, periodical, or similar publication which is now being issued by a department or establishment of the Government may, in the discretion of the head thereof, be continued, within the limitation of available appropriations or other Government funds, until June 30, 1921, when, if it shall not have been specifically authorized by Congress before that date, such journal, magazine, periodical, or similar publication shall be discontinued.

That contemplates the discontinuance of all of those publications which were not in the meantime provided for by Congress and which were not statistical reports of the condition of the departments of the Government on June 30 last. When the time was about to expire Congress, in the sundry civil bill for 1920, made a provision which extended it up to December 1, 1921, in the following language:

> SEC. 3. Any journal, magazine, periodical, or similar publication which is now being issued by a department or establishment of the Government may, in the discretion of the head thereof, be continued, within the limitation of available appropriations or other Government funds, until December 1, 1921, when, if it shall not have been specifically authorized by Congress before that date, such journal, magazine, periodical, or similar publication shall be discontinued.

There is a good deal of misapprehension as to what that means. Many people are wiring us and making all sorts of demands as to the Labor Review and other statistical reports which, if confined within their legitimate bounds of furnishing information and not publish magazines and newspapers, are not prohibited by this law. But there is a wide conception that all of these publications go out automatically as the result of this provision.

There is another provision in the same act which confers certain powers on the Joint Committee on Printing, and they have given instructions to the Public Printer which will enable every department to publish everything which it is legitimately entitled to publish as a governmental publication. That will be found on page 1430, volume 41, of the Public Laws in the same act.

Money appropriated under the foregoing allotments shall not be expended for printing or binding for any of the executive departments or other Government establishments, except such as shall be certified in writing to the Public Printer by the respective heads or chiefs thereof to be necessary to conduct the ordinary and routine business required by law of such executive departments or Government establishments, and except such reports, monographs, bulletins, or other publications as are authorized by law or specifically provided for in appropriations herein; all other printing required or deemed necessary or desirable by heads of executive departments or other Government establishments or offices or bureaus thereof shall be done only as Congress shall from time to time authorize.

Therefore each department has the right to have these things necessary for the conduct of the business of the United States with reference to its activities which should be communicated to the general public and to have it printed at the Government Printing Office by certifying that they are certain documents.

When it comes to the point where they want something printed which they are not prepared to certify to, which they are not prepared honestly to say is legitimate under the purview of the law constituting the department, then it ought to be stopped, and it will be stopped. Otherwise the legitimate publications will go on.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Statistical publications are still permitted?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; they are expressly recognized.

Mr. MANN. Who determines whether a publication is statistical, which may be printed, or reading matter, which may not be published?

Mr. STEVENSON. Primarily the department which proposes to publish it determines that, and according to our construction of this law and the rule adopted by the Joint Committee it must certify that fact to the Public Printer. Then if it be so glaringly not that—if it is so apparently a misrepresentation of the facts—the Public Printer takes the liberty of submitting the matter to the Joint Committee on Printing, which finally does determine it. I do not know that it has any right to do so, but it does do it, and it will certainly not act arbitrarily in refusing a publication. However, if there is anything which is so glaringly improper which is claimed to be statistical the committee would certainly not hesitate to stop its printing.

Adverting to abuses which are growing up and which are attempted to be put across, just this morning we had submitted to us a bulletin from the Navy Department, which it is getting out or wants to get out, with a beautifully colored cover upon it. We do not allow them to publish anything under the law that has colored pictures and all of that without express authorization from the Printing Committee. Here was a bulletin the title of which was, "How to keep fit." It was a pamphlet and was addressed to young men especially who are supposed to be preparing to enlist in the Navy. The subject of how to keep fit was discussed, illustrated, and illuminated, and it was advice on how to keep free from certain diseases peculiar to young men of dissipated habits. In other words, we were asked to issue an expensively gotten-up, beautifully illustrated, colored printed bulletin to the young men of the country on how to avoid certain diseases which need not now be mentioned. That is the kind of thing we meet constantly. Gentlemen will see that we do not lie in a bed of roses always. The committee has made up its mind that this annual waste of two or three millions of dollars expended in the printing of useless publications must stop. They are not only expensive to the Government from the standpoint of the printing and the cost of the paper, but they are an enormous burden to the postal facilities, because they are loaded into the post office and sent everywhere. The practice ought to be stopped.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Also they came before the committee this morning with the request from the Navy Department to have printed as a House document four of the first pamphlets on the history of the Navy in the late war.

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Two have already been printed as monographs to the number to which the Navy is limited, but they find that they are not going to have very great circulation, so that they now have the audacity to determine on a plan of printing them for the Army and the Navy as House documents, something that might run along for 20 years.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is quite true. If gentlemen present have any constituents writing them that the Labor Review is going to be stopped and that therefore the foundations of the Government are being destroyed, I suggest that they write back and ask the people who write to them if they ever saw a copy of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yesterday copies of the Congressional Directory were delivered to all of the Members of the House, and to-day carriers came around taking them all up, with the statement that there was an error in them and that they were going to take them back and reprint them. Can the gentleman tell us what the error is and who is responsible for it and who is going to bear the loss of reprinting them?

Mr. STEVENSON. I have not heard of that incident, but we will undoubtedly have some trouble about it if that is the case. There is a propaganda in the country, especially by the people connected with the Federation of Labor and the Labor Department, which is causing letters to be written here from all over the United States. These letters come from colleges and from ladies' associations, they come from female voters' clubs, and they come from everywhere. It is stated that there is a proposition to stop the Labor Review, and that thereby irreparable damage will be done in the way of crippling all social work in the country. If gentlemen will ask some of these people who write these letters what they know about the Labor Review, they will not receive any reply, because they do not know anything, never having seen a copy of it, but they are simply writing in response to propaganda.

You are at liberty to say to them that if the Labor Review complies with the law as we have put it here to-day, if the Labor Department conforms to the legitimate functions for which it was established, and publishes those things which are legitimately to be used by the institutions of this country, there would be no trouble about its being stopped. However, if they continue to publish a magazine, especially a magazine that reviews books and prints commendations of soviet literature and all that sort of thing, so far as I am concerned, and I think I speak for the Printing Committee of the House, we do not propose that it shall be further published at the expense of the voters of the United States.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The Printing Committee has reported favorably the House resolutions which were passed by the Senate to continue all of these publications for a temporary period.

Mr. STEVENSON. Until the 1st of March next.

Mr. MANN. I have been taking an interest in this matter of retrenching expenditures for useless printing for many years. At different times we have passed different acts, but most of them have been evaded or extended in some way. I take it that the gentleman favored that resolution. Would it kill anyone if we stopped them all until they got further authority to go ahead?

Mr. STEVENSON. That resolution was reported by a majority of the House Printing Committee, and I voted for the report with this in view. We were being besought by a great many people who said that certain matter was being destroyed and that they had not had an opportunity to have hearings; that if we would have hearings from all these people they could be concluded by the 1st of March, and then we could stop whatever should be stopped. After canvassing the situation and determining that they can proceed with all that is legitimate, the conclusion of the Printing Committee is to ask that the resolution be recommitted and that the matter rest where it is and let them get along with the authority that they have.

Mr. MANN. I am very glad to hear the statement the gentleman makes that an effort is not to be made to pass that resolution.

Mr. STEVENSON. It looked as if it was necessary to pass it in justice to some people.

Mr. MANN. I was confident it would not pass last Monday by unanimous consent. The truth is these same things now have been more or less pending with the Committee on Printing, authorizing them to continue publications for several years. How much they have authorized I do not know. Apparently sometimes it hits somebody's pet. I am not referring to the Printing Committee.

Mr. STEVENSON. We have none. They are all orphans to us.

Mr. MANN. I would like to see some of these publications stopped. I do not remember now how many there are. I understood a year or so ago that there were about a thousand Government publications—perhaps that is a wild exaggeration—in different forms. I hope the Joint Committee on Printing will not give authority simply because somebody asks for it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If Congress, and particularly the Budget Committee and the enlarged Appropriation Committee, will pay particular attention to the words "editors" and "subeditors," who want employment to edit a little, we will get some relief.

Mr. MANN. We passed a law some time ago forbidding the Forestry Service to publish anything. What did it do? They changed the form and the name. The only place it can be corrected is in the Government Printing Office under a law where they refuse to furnish printing.

Mr. STEVENSON. I will state to the gentleman that the number when we began this reduction was 200 and odd, and there have been 111 of them cut out. There are, according to my recollection, 112 of them that are still in existence on the 30th of November. I think the likelihood is they will be chopped down to about 50 or 60. I think that is about the situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be read for amendment.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do not recall a single instance in which unlimited discretion has by law been given to an executive officer to sell land owned by the United States Government in a city at private sale. If such a thing has ever happened, it ought never to happen again. Public property should always be sold after publication of a notice of the proposed sale, and in order to protect the Government that notice should always include the statement that it will be sold to the highest bidder and that the officer acting for the Government reserves the right to reject any or all bids.

That is the only proper way to make sale of public property. But this bill gives the right to the Secretary of the Treasury to sell this land in San Francisco in his discretion to anybody, on any terms, and at private sale. The bill itself, in my judgment, plainly shows that this is not to be a public but a private sale, for it does not provide that if he offer it at public sale he may nevertheless reject any or all bids. That right is not reserved. And there being no reservation of this right, which is absolutely necessary in public sales made bona fide, the bill shows on its face that the property in San Francisco is to be disposed of in private. The bill indicates this, beyond question, to be the fact.

Now, I have just found a law, enacted in 1908, for the construction of a new Federal building at Buffalo, N. Y., and for the sale of the old building. It reads:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to sell the old customhouse and post office building and the site thereof at the corner of Seneca and Washington Streets, in the city of Buffalo and State of New York, at public or private sale, after proper advertisement, at such time and on such terms as he may deem to be for the best interests of the United States, and to deposit the proceeds of said sale in the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt: Provided,—

And this proviso is important—

Provided, That said building and site shall not be sold for a sum less than $100,000.

In that case the law gave the Secretary the right to sell at public or at private sale, but only "after proper advertisement," and that means after public advertisement. There is nothing of that kind in the bill before us. That law contained also the proviso that the old building and site should not be sold for less than $100,000. The Government protected itself in that way. What was considered to be a fair price was fixed in the law. If he could get more all right, but he could not take less. But the pending bill contains no provision of that kind. It contains no safeguards whatever. The Secretary is to make the sale on any terms in his discretion and in private. The terms need not be made public until after the sale has become effective.

Now, although sometimes this sort of thing may have happened in the history of this Government, it is a practice which ought not to continue. It is a practice wholly vicious. No man, I care not who he may be, should ever be given unlimited discretion to dispose of Government real estate in a city at private sale.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the words "or private."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin: Page 1, line 5, strike out the words "or private."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it be passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it be passed. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 5700) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the old subtreasury property at San Francisco, Calif., had directed him to report the same back to the House without amendment, with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ELLIOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ACQUISITION OF GOVERNMENT PROPERTY FOR STREET PURPOSES, CHICAGO, ILL.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, I call up the bill (H. R. 9021) to permit the city of Chicago to acquire real estate of the United States of America.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois calls up the bill H. R. 9021, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9021) to permit the city of Chicago to acquire real estate of the United States of America.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar, and the House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for its consideration. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] will please resume the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9021, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9021, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in consideration of the payment by the city of Chicago to the United States of America of the just compensation and damages for the real estate hereinafter described, as ascertained by a jury in proceedings to condemn real estate of the United States of America, the city of Chicago is hereby authorized to acquire for street purposes by two separate condemnation proceedings all interests of the United States of America in and to the following-described parcels of real estate, viz:

(a) The east 17 feet of south 100 feet of north 133 feet of west 125 feet of east 158 feet of south quarter of east half of northeast quarter of section 30, township 38 north, range 14 east, of third principal meridian, in the city of Chicago, county of Cook, and State of Illinois; and

(b) The east 17 feet of (except south 149 feet of south 100 feet of north 133 feet of west 125 feet of east 158 feet) south quarter of east half of northeast quarter of section 30, township 38 north, range 14 east, of third principal meridian, in the city of Chicago, count, of Cook, and State of Illinois.

SEC. 2. That the city of Chicago shall assume the burden of reconstruction made necessary by the taking described in section 1 hereof, which reconstruction shall be done subject to inspection by the United States Government. The cost of said reconstruction shall be deducted from the award by jury provided for in section 1 hereof and used by the city of Chicago for this purpose.

SEC. 3. That this act shall be in force from and after its passage.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Page 2, strike out all of section 2, comprising lines 16 to 22, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to expend such portion of said award as in his judgment may be necessary to restore or repair Government buildings or improvements taken or damaged by reason of the taking of said parcels of real estate; and the Attorney General is hereby authorized and directed to accept service and to appear on behalf of the United States to the extent necessary to protect the interest of the United States in said proceedings: Provided, That in the event the amount estimated and included in the jury's award for the restoration and repair of said buildings and improvements made necessary by the taking of said parcels of real estate shall prove insufficient for said purposes the city of Chicago shall pay any difference or balance not covered by said award therefor."

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the city of Chicago some years ago launched a general plan for the improvement of the big thoroughfares in that community. Bond issues have been authorized by the vote of the people of the city for the acquisition of the land necessary for the widening of some of the principal streets, and condemnation proceedings have also been begun for the acquisition of the land necessary. Special assessment proceedings, so called, have also been instituted, under which the property owners are required to contribute their proper shares for the improvement of the streets upon which their properties are located.

One of these principal thoroughfares in Chicago is Ashland Avenue. In 1919, by a vote of the people of the city, a bond issue of $5,800,000 was authorized for the widening of Ashland Avenue. It happens that upon Ashland Avenue the Government of the United States has a piece of property between Seventy-fourth Street and Seventy-fifth Street South, property belonging to the War Department and used by the Ordnance Department. There are some buildings upon it. It is necessary at this point to widen Ashland Avenue 17 feet.

Ashland Avenue has a width in some places of 66 feet and at this particular point a width of 83 feet. It is proposed to enlarge the avenue to a uniform width of 100 feet for a length of 22 miles, running from the extreme north end of the city to pretty nearly the extreme south end. As stated, condemnation proceedings have been begun by the city to acquire the necessary land for this widening of the avenue.

This bill authorizes the bringing of such condemnation proceedings against the United States of America for the acquisition of 17 feet of the west frontage of Ashland Avenue between Seventy-fourth and Seventy-fifth Streets.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. When was this property acquired, and what is it being used for now? It was acquired during the war, was it not?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It was acquired principally during the war. Some of it was acquired only in the last two or three years.

Mr. SABATH. It is not being used now?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. There is a storage depot at the corner, as I recall it, of Seventy-fourth Street and Ashland Avenue. One of the buildings involved here has never been used at all. It is supposed that it was intended to be used as a telephone exchange, but it never was so used.

This bill, as I started to say, would authorize condemnation proceedings to be brought by the city for the acquisition of the property owned by the Government.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. As I understand, if any of these buildings are taken under these condemnation proceedings, they will have to pay whatever damage is done.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The condemnation proceedings, of course, will require the city to pay not only the value of the land, but as well the value of the buildings taken and the cost of restoration and repairing and rebuilding the portions of the buildings which are taken down.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I did not hear the first part of the gentleman's statement, but has the gentleman found any cases where the property of the United States Government has been placed subject to condemnation proceedings instituted by a municipality or a State?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes. I have found an exact precedent in one of the appropriation bills of the last Congress; and I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that this bill follows practically the language which was placed in that bill by the Committee on Appropriations of the last Congress, but this present bill goes into much more detail.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman cite the instance? Does he recall it?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I looked it up at the particular time that this matter was before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It was the legislative, executive, and judicial supply bill passed March 3, 1921. The section will be found on page 1310 of volume 41, Public Laws, of the Sixty-sixth Congress.

Two elements of value are involved—the value of the land and the value of the damages to the buildings. So far as the value of the land is concerned, there can be no difference of opinion whatever as to what that value will be as found by the award of the jury, because land in that locality, in fact, as everybody knows, in all cities, is valued upon either a front-foot basis or a square-foot basis. Land here is valued on a square-foot basis, and all of the land in the immediate neighborhood is substantially of the same value. The vacant land in the block south and the land in the block north will be condemned, and there is some vacant land in this block which will be condemned, and the award will easily show the value which the jury places upon the land.

So far as the value of the buildings is concerned, this bill provides that in the event that the award of the jury should not be sufficient—and we have no doubt it will be adequate—to pay for complete restoration and rebuilding of the portions of the buildings which are taken, then the city of Chicago out of its corporate funds shall pay any balance or difference.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. If these streets are run through there, will they destroy all or simply portions of the existing Government buildings?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Very small portions. I have a letter here written by Col. D. M. King, of the Ordnance Department of the United States Army, who is located at the Government arsenal at Rock Island, Ill. He made an investigation of this matter for the War Department, and went up to Chicago upon invitation of the city. In a letter dated November 1, 1921, to the Chief of Engineers of the War Department he states fully just what will be taken. He says:

Building A is a two-story building, which is now being used as the Chicago storage depot office. Only a small portion of it is used. Should these condemnation proceedings be approved, 17 feet must be cut from the front end of the building. This will not be detrimental to the operation of the plant. Building B is a one-story storeroom. Seventeen feet would be cut from its front. This can readily be spared. Building C is a concrete one-story building which sets back about 7 feet from the fence. About 10 feet would therefore have to be cut from its front. On the maps of the depot it is marked "Service building." There is nothing installed therein. I can find no one who knows for what it was erected. I am of the opinion, however, that it was for switchboards. Making it 7 feet shorter will not be detrimental. Building D is a concrete one-story building. On the maps of the depot it is marked "transformer vault." There is nothing installed therein. It sets back about 7 feet from the street; therefore about 10 feet would be cut off the front end. This would not be detrimental. Building E (so designated on the accompanying chart) is not a building, but is the extreme ends of the two runways for outside traveling cranes. Cutting off the ends of these craneways will not be detrimental to the plant nor its operation. Building F is a cooling reservoir. It is a concrete open tank, the top of which is practically level with the ground. About 10 feet will have to be cut from the front side of this tank. This would not be detrimental.

That is a complete survey of all of the buildings, showing that in some cases 10 feet will be cut off, and in some cases 17 feet will be cut off, but there will be no injury to the buildings for their present uses, and the buildings will be more than adequate for any purposes for which they have ever been intended.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Some of them are not in use at all.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Not in use at all.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Why should the amount that will be awarded to the Government as incidental damages be expended in repairing buildings for which the Government has no use, instead of paying it into the Treasury?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If we do not restore the fronts of those buildings, they will stand there with wide-open fronts, and it will not be very long until those buildings are altogether destroyed by the elements. Of course the city of Chicago is really not concerned with the question whether the Government wants to restore its buildings or not, but the War Department wants to have those buildings restored.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Some of them are really temporary buildings, are they not?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. No; they are not temporary. This property is in the district of my colleague [Mr. SPROUL], in the neighborhood where he lives, and he is entirely familiar with the physical condition there. If the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] is willing, I suggest that I be permitted to yield a few moments time to him to state the physical situation down there.

Mr. BIRD. Other than pushing back the ingress and egress of these buildings does the contemplated plan change the ingress and egress?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Not at all. The same fronts will be restored, and exactly the same condition will be reestablished as the present one.

Mr. EVANS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. EVANS. Can the gentleman give us any information as to what the present value of that property is compared with the cost to the Government?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I do not think there is any substantial change in the present value as compared with the cost to the Government three or four years ago.

Mr. EVANS. Why should there not be a sufficient award to place the buildings in good condition after the condemnation?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. There will be. There is no question about that. That is the purpose of the condemnation proceedings; but the proviso is put in the committee amendment so that nobody can question that the Government will be adequately and fully recompensed.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. But might there not be enough in excess to pay for the value of the land there and for restoring it?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. There will be. The bill provides only with reference to the cost of restoration, that portion of the award that relates to the restoration, that the city shall pay any deficiency. The portion of the award that relates to the value of the land will be covered into the Treasury beyond any question, as will also any surplus after the building has been rebuilt or restored.

Mr. MANN. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. In connection with that there is no authority here, as I understand, for the city to levy a special assessment against this property for benefits by opening the street.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I thank my colleague for referring to that. I was coming to it. An estimate has been made by the valuation committee of the Chicago Real Estate Board. That board has a valuation committee which places values upon property to be sold or to be purchased upon the request of its members or upon the request of others who pay for the service rendered by the valuation committee of the board. They have placed an estimate of value on the land, upon the value of the portion of the buildings taken, and also on the cost of the rebuilding and restoring; these three elements have been included in the valuation. They have placed a total valuation of $33,360 for the 17 feet running between Seventy-fourth and Seventy-fifth Streets. The valuation placed by the valuation committee of the Chicago Real Estate Board on the increased value of the property and improvements is $8,890. Every other property owner on Ashland Avenue must contribute his share of the increased valuation, but the Government will not be required to contribute anything. In fact, the Government gets its increased value, which has been estimated at $8,890 by the committee, without any expense to the Government.

Now, I will yield to my colleague [Mr. SPROUL] such time as he may desire with reference to the inquiry of the gentleman from Tennessee or of any other Member.

Mr. SPROUL. Mr. Chairman, my colleague has covered the situation so thoroughly that I have not much to say. The Government acquired this property during the war and erected what they claim to be a shell factory, although no shells have ever been manufactured there.

To-day they use it for a storehouse for the Ordnance Department. I am satisfied that the buildings are not going to be damaged, so far as the use to which they want to put them. The city of Chicago was willing to pay for the land and pay for restoring the buildings to as good condition as they are at the present time.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPROUL. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Does the gentleman believe that it would be advisable for the Government to sell all of that property in view of the fact that it has no further use for it?

Mr. SPROUL. I think it would. I think there is no question about it.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. It might be that a private purchaser would not want the buildings restored at all, that they would not count it in the bid, and that it would be throwing away that much money of the award in restoring the useless buildings.

Mr. SPROUL. No. The buildings should be restored. Those buildings cost about $2,500,000; they cover several blocks, and the most of them are fireproof and of splendid construction. I have understood from several real estate men that several manufacturers have been trying to negotiate for those buildings.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Are they suitable for manufacturing?

Mr. SPROUL. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPROUL. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are these the brick two-story buildings on Seventy-fourth Street which were used after the armistice for storing abandoned machinery by the Ordnance Department?

Mr. SPROUL. Yes; and are still used for that purpose.

Mr. STAFFORD. When I was out of Congress I went down there to inspect the machinery which was to be sold later by the Government. As I recall, they are two-story buildings of structural steel.

Mr. SPROUL. Yes; structural steel and reinforced concrete.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. The gentleman's explanation is sufficient. I had no idea that they were such buildings. I supposed they were temporary structures.

Mr. SPROUL. Yes; they are finely-constructed buildings. I think if the Government decided to sell, it would be possible to get a purchaser for them immediately. They would make splendid buildings for manufacturers. Mr. Chairman, I think my colleague covered the whole ground. The city has provided a bond issue of $5,800,000, and it is really a necessity that it should take this land. Ashland Avenue is practically a business street for 22 miles. There is a great deal of manufacturing on it, and to-day it is almost impossible to get traffic through. The people there want the improvement, and they can not get it unless Congress consents to allow them to commence condemnation proceedings against the Government.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I will ask if any member of the committee desires any further information on this subject. If not, I will ask that the bill be read for amendment.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few remarks on the measure. Of course, we all realize that municipal arteries of commerce in a city as large as Chicago are very essential. The purpose of the bond issue which has been mentioned was to afford such a street in the city of Chicago of a width of 100 feet and a length of approximately 22 miles.

This bill as originally drawn was objectionable in section 2. It provided that the city of Chicago should assume the burden of reconstruction and that the cost of this reconstruction should be deducted from the award made by the jury as provided for in section 1. This provision was objectionable to the Secretary of War, who asked that the measure be amended in order that the expenditures for restoration might be made by the War Department under the authority and direction and supervision of the Secretary of War. This insures the restoration of these buildings to the complete satisfaction of the Government. There is a further proviso included in the amended measure that if the award should prove insufficient for this purpose, in so far as the restoration of the buildings is concerned, any additional amount necessary will be paid also by the city of Chicago. It seems to me that for the purpose of facilitating the necessary traffic of this great metropolis, and in consideration of the fact that the contemplated alteration of the buildings will not be a detriment in the service to which the United States is putting them, and that we are to be fully compensated and the restoration is to be made under Government direction, there is no reason why the bill should not pass.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I am personally familiar with Ashland Avenue. I live on this street and have property within about 2 miles of Seventy-fourth and Seventy-fifth Streets. Ashland Avenue is a section line, and it is absolutely necessary to widen that great thoroughfare. The city and the people of Chicago are greatly interested. Not only have $5,000,000 of bonds been voted but the property owners will be assessed in addition, so that this improvement will cost probably from $10,000,000 to $12,000,000. The people are ready to pay for it. This property which we have acquired during the war I do not think will be of any value to the Government in the future, and it should be disposed of, because the buildings that have been erected, I think, can not be utilized to any advantage. I know the improvement is needed and that Ashland Avenue ought to be widened. It can not be done until we can secure permission to widen that section where the Government is interested. I think the bill should pass.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be read for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the city of Chicago shall assume the burden of reconstruction made necessary by the taking described in section 1 hereof, which reconstruction shall be done subject to inspection by the United States Government. The cost of said reconstruction shall be deducted from the award by jury provided for in section 1 hereof and used by the city of Chicago for this purpose.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 2, line 16, strike out all of section 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to expend such portion of said award as in his judgment may be necessary to restore or repair Government buildings or improvements taken or damaged by reason of the taking of said parcels of real estate; and the Attorney General is hereby authorized and directed to accept service and to appear on behalf of the United States to the extent necessary to protect the interest of the United States in said proceedings: Provided, That in the event the amount estimated and included in the jury's award for the restoration and repair of said buildings and improvements made necessary by the taking of said parcels of real estate shall prove insufficient for said purposes the city of Chicago shall pay any difference or balance not covered by said award therefor."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9021) to permit the city of Chicago to acquire real estate of the United States of America, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CHINDBLOM, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PANAMA CANAL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, the annual report of the governor of the Panama Canal for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 7, 1921.

STATE DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a statement by the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, of appropriations, expenditures, and balances of appropriations under the control of the Department of State for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 7, 1921.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, December 7, 1921.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SIR: In compliance with the provisions of the act of June 30, 1906, making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907 (34 Stat., p. 679), I have the honor to transmit herewith for the information of Congress a statement of the number of persons employed in meat inspection, the salary or per diem paid to each, where they have been or are employed, together with contingent expenses for the period beginning July 1, 1920, and ending June 30, 1921. This statement was prepared by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Respectfully,

WARREN G. HARDING.

PORTO RICO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

As required by section 12 of the act of Congress approved March 12, 1917, entitled "An act to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," I transmit herewith for the information of Congress the report of the Governor of Porto Rico for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921.

This report will not be printed as a part of the annual report of the War Department as heretofore.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 7, 1921.

BUREAU OF EFFICIENCY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

To the Congress of the United States:

As required by the acts of March 4, 1915, and February 28, 1916, I transmit herewith the reports of the United States Bureau of Efficiency for the years ended October 31, 1919, 1920, and 1921.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 7, 1921.

AVIATION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the Congress of the United States:

In compliance with the provisions of the act of March 3, 1915, establishing the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, I transmit herewith the seventh annual report of the committee for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921.

I think there can be no doubt that the development of aviation will become of great importance for the purposes of commerce, as well as for national defense. While the material progress in aircraft has been remarkable, the use has not as yet been extensively developed in America. This has been due, in the main, to lack of wise and necessary legislation. Aviation is destined to make great strides, and I believe that America, its birthplace, can and should be foremost in its development.

I therefore urge upon the Congress the advisability of giving heed to the recommendations of the committee, the first and most important of which is that a bureau be established in the Department of Commerce for the regulation and development of air navigation.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 7, 1921.

The SPEAKER. That will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WALSH. Do I understand the Speaker refers that to the Committee on Appropriations?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did so, but the Chair is questioning the accuracy of that. The matter always has been referred to the Committee on Appropriations, but the gentleman probably has in mind that this suggests legislation. The Chair is informed that a bill has been introduced providing for such a bureau and that that bill has been referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Therefore, unless there is some other suggestion, the Chair will ask unanimous consent to change the reference to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 81. Joint resolution authorizing the erection on public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of a memorial to the dead of the First Division, American Expeditionary Forces, in the World War.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 2708. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer without charge certain surplus material of the War Department to the American Relief Administration in Russia; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 36 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Thursday, December 8, 1921, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

379. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report showing proceeds from the "Sale of surplus and obsolete material and equipment during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921," and from "Collections from town-site assessments during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921, in the Territory of Alaska"; to the Committee on Appropriations.

380. A letter from the Librarian of the Library of Congress, transmitting annual report of the Librarian of Congress and the annual report of the superintendent of the Library building and grounds for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921; to the Committee on the Library.

381. A letter from the Acting Attorney General, transmitting statement of the expenditures under appropriations for the United States Court of Customs Appeals for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice.

382. A letter from the Acting Attorney General, transmitting report showing for the first four months of the fiscal year 1922 the average number of employees, including the courts of the United States, receiving the increased compensation at the rate of $240 per annum; also the average number by grades receiving the same at each other rate; to the Committee on Appropriations.

383. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting report showing the number of officers and employees of the Navy Department who during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921, traveled on official business from Washington to points outside the District of Columbia; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department.

384. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting statements showing exchanges made during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921, of typewriters, adding machines, and other similar labor-saving devices by the Navy Department and Naval Establishment, including the United States Marine Corps; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department.

385. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting statement showing the amount of pay and allowances by ranks and ratings for officers and enlisted men of the Navy; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department.

386. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting statement of the expenditures of the Coast Guard for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

387. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting report in detail giving the number of the various publications issued by the Treasury Department during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921; to the Committee on Printing.

388. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

389. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting 865 reports of inspections of disbursements and transfers by officers of the Army received in the office of the Inspector General during the past fiscal year; to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department.

390. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a statement showing the documents received and distributed during the fiscal year 1921; to the Committee on Printing.

391. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting report of number of employees who have traveled on official business from Washington to points outside the District of Columbia during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department.

392. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, together with the statement of the cost of manufacture for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921, at the several named United States arsenals and at Springfield Armory; to the Committee of Military Affairs.

393. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting letter from The Adjutant General, United States Army, together with a statement of publications on hand, received, and issued by the War Department during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921; to the Committee on Printing.

394. A letter from the President of the United States, transmitting the annual report of the governor of the Panama Canal for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

395. A letter from the President of the United States, transmitting statement by the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, of appropriations, expenditures, and balances of appropriations under the control of the Department of State for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of State.

396. A letter from the President of the United States, transmitting statement of the number of persons employed in meat inspection, the salary paid each, where they have been or are employed, together with contingent expenses for the period beginning July 1, 1920, and ending June 30, 1921; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture.

397. A letter from the President of the United States, transmitting the report of the Governor of Porto Rico for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921; to the Committee on Insular Affairs.

398. A letter from the President of the United States, transmitting the reports of the United States Bureau of Efficiency for the years ended October 31, 1919, 1920, and 1921; to the Committee on Appropriations.

399. A letter from the President of the United States, transmitting the seventh annual report of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. RAKER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8815) to authorize certain homestead settlers or entrymen on United States reclamation projects who entered the military or naval service of the United States during the war with Germany to make final proof of their entries, reported the same with an amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 500), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. JONES of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8818) granting the consent of Congress to the city of Pittsburgh, a municipal corporation of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Monongahela River at or near its junction with the Allegheny River in the city of Pittsburgh, in the county of Allegheny, in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 501), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9050) granting the consent of Congress to the Pamunkey Ferry Co. to construct a bridge across the Pamunkey River in Virginia, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 502), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. YOUNG: A bill (H. R. 9381) to provide for the extension of time within which loans may be made by the War Finance Corporation and the extension of the time within which the corporation shall proceed to liquidate its assets and wind up its affairs; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

3229. By Mr. KISSEL: Petition of Frank J. Brial, James J. McCarthy, John J. Lynch, James J. O'Keefe, Francis W. Stulz, and James Treacy, all of Brooklyn, N. Y.; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

3230. By Mr. RANSLEY: Petition of thousands of citizens of the third congressional district of Pennsylvania, urging recognition of the republic of Ireland by the United States; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

3231. By Mr. WATSON: Resolutions passed by the Elk County Manufacturers' Association, favoring American valuation plan; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 8, 1921.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, we rejoice before Thee this morning that Thy mercies fail not, and that as we come into Thy presence we are assured of Thy guidance and help. May we so realize that blessedness of trust in Thee that this day shall be memorable in our history in the accomplishment of duties well attended to, and in the right consciousness of duties well preserved to Thy glory. For Thy name's sake. Amen.

GEORGE W. NORRIS, a Senator from the State of Nebraska, and JOHN K. SHIELDS, a Senator from the State of Tennessee, appeared in their seats to-day.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed bills of the following titles, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 5700. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the old subtreasury property at San Francisco, Calif.;

H. R. 8401. An act to transfer the custody and control of the United States customhouse wharf at Charleston, S. C., from the Treasury Department to the War Department; and

H. R. 9021. An act to permit the city of Chicago to acquire real estate of the United States of America.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. J. Res. 81) authorizing the erection on public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of a memorial to the dead of the First Division, American Expeditionary Forces, in the World War, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. McLEAN presented a resolution adopted at a meeting of citizens of Watertown, Conn., indorsing the Conference on Limitation of Armament and the leadership of the United States in making military and naval sacrifices, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented eight letters and a telegram in the nature of petitions from sundry citizens of New Britain, Bridgeport, and Ansonia, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for the passage of Senate resolution 173, expressing the hope that the differences between Great Britain and Ireland may be speedily composed, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of 942 employees of the Waterbury Clock Co., of Waterbury, Conn., praying for the enactment of the so-called Fordney tariff bill with the American valuation plan included, so as to enable manufacturers to better meet foreign competition and maintain American living standards for employees, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DILLINGHAM presented resolutions adopted by Division No. 2, Ancient Order of Hibernians, of West Rutland, Vt., indorsing the so-called La Follette resolution relative to Ireland, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WILLIS presented a resolution adopted by the Cincinnati (Ohio) Clearing House Association, protesting against inclusion in the tax law of the $300 exemption on dividends or interest from domestic building and loan associations, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

PRINTING OF TREATIES WITH GERMANY AND AUSTRIA.

Mr. MOSES, from the Committee on Printing, reported a resolution (S. Res. 185), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the treaties between the United States and Germany and Austria be printed as a Senate document.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 2801) to amend section 21 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes," approved May 28, 1896; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. STERLING:

A bill (S. 2802) to amend an act entitled "An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes," approved May 22, 1920; to the Committee on Civil Service.

By Mr. HEFLIN:

A bill (S. 2803) to amend an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provisions for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 4, 1920; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. McNARY (for Mr. JOHNSON):

A bill (S. 2804) to amend section 9 of an act entitled "An act to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes," approved October 6, 1917, as amended; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. DILLINGHAM:

A bill (S. 2805) granting an increase of pension to Julia A. Roberts (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CARAWAY:

A bill (S. 2806) for the relief of Paul B. Belding; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 2807) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. M. E. Jackman; to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 2808) making eligible for retirement under the same conditions as now provided for officers of the Regular Army, Lieut. Leonard C. Boyd, an officer of the United States Army during the World War, who incurred physical disability in line of duty; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. ELKINS:

A bill (S. 2809) granting a pension to John D. Crouch; to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 2810) to amend and reenact section 113 of chapter 5 of the Judicial Code of the United States, as amended and reenacted by an act approved August 22, 1914; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. McNARY:

A bill (S. 2811) to encourage the development of the agricultural resources of the United States through Federal and State cooperation, giving preference in the matter of employment and the establishment of rural homes to those who have served with the military and naval forces of the United States; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

By Mr. NORBECK:

A bill (S. 2812) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to extend the payment of construction charges on reclamation projects for one year, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

AMENDMENT OF DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WELLER submitted an amendment proposing that the Comptroller General of the United States be authorized to audit and adjust the claim of the city of Baltimore, Md., for reimbursement for money expended and for obligations incurred and paid to aid the United States in the construction of works of defense in and around the city of Baltimore during the Civil War, intended to be proposed by him to House bill 9237, the deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by title and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

H. R. 5700. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the old Subtreasury property at San Francisco, Calif.;

H. R. 8401. An act to transfer the custody and control of the United States customhouse wharf at Charleston, S. C., from the Treasury Department to the War Department; and

H. R. 9021. An act to permit the city of Chicago to acquire real estate of the United States of America.

INVESTIGATION OF LOBBYING ACTIVITIES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 77.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 77, proposing to create a special committee to investigate the expenditures made in behalf of various propaganda and in the maintenance of lobbies in Washington.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fletcher	McKellar	Robinson
Borah	Frelinghuysen	McNary	Sheppard
Bursum	Harris	Moses	Shortridge
Capper	Harrison	Myers	Spencer
Culberson	Heflin	Nelson	Sterling
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Nicholson	Trammell
Dial	Kendrick	Norbeck	Wadsworth
du Pont	Keyes	Norris	Walsh, Mont.
Edge	King	Page	Warren
Elkins	Ladd	Phipps	Weller
Fernald	Lenroot	Poindexter

Mr. CURTIS. I was requested to announce that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] are engaged in hearings before the Committee on Finance.

I was also requested to announce that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr.

ERNST], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] are engaged on business of the Senate.

I also wish to announce that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARREID] is absent on account of illness, and that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE] is absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. HEFLIN. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is absent on account of the death of his mother.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is detained at home on business, and that the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] is necessarily detained by illness.

I wish also to announce that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] is absent on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The reading clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. CARAWAY, Mr. FRANCE, and Mr. TOWNSEND answered to their names when called.

Mr. DIAL. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. SMITH] is unavoidably detained from the Senate.

Mr. GLASS, Mr. MCKINLEY, Mr. BALL, Mr. CARAWAY, Mr. CALDER, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. BROUSSARD, Mr. MCLEAN, Mr. SUTHERLAND, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. KELLOGG, and Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution No. 77, being a resolution submitted by him May 12, 1921, proposing to create a special committee to investigate the expenditures made in behalf of various propaganda and in the maintenance of lobbies in Washington.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I should like to ask if a committee of the Senate was not appointed under a similar resolution?

Mr. KING. Replying to the Senator from South Dakota, I desire to say that this resolution when it was originally introduced was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Committee on the Judiciary appointed a subcommittee, of which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] were named as members for the consideration of the subject embraced in the resolution. That committee had some hearings, and later reported back a resolution, which is now upon the calendar.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator from Utah refers to the resolution relating to the investigation of the dye industry?

Mr. KING. Yes. They modified the resolution as it was introduced, limiting the investigation to the dye lobby and its activities. That resolution was then, as a mere matter of form, as I supposed, referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. That committee reported the resolution back with one amendment, eliminating the clause of the resolution as it came from the Committee on the Judiciary which authorized the sending for witnesses, and so forth. That resolution is now on the calendar. The explanation was made by the chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate that the committee eliminated that provision of the resolution because they considered it a duplication, the committee already having the power to send for witnesses and to incur the necessary expenses incident to the proposed investigation.

Mr. STERLING. I recall that discussion.

Mr. KING. I insisted that, even if the committee possessed that power, there would be no impropriety, "to make assurance double sure," in permitting the provision to stand.

Mr. STERLING. But, as I understand, the resolution for which the Senator from Utah asks consideration is another resolution providing for the appointment of a special committee?

Mr. KING. No; it is the same resolution, and I am now asking for its consideration. Objections to the consideration of the resolution have been made and its passage has been blocked thereby.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator's request is now confined to the resolution as reported?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator form Utah [Mr. KING] to proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The motion, I understand, is as to whether we shall or shall not take up the resolution?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to take up the resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays the resolution before the Senate, and it will be read.

The reading clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 77) which had been reported by the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment in the nature of a substitute and subsequently reported by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate with an amendment to strike out the last paragraph of the substitute resolution in the following words:

Resolved further, That the committee is authorized to subpœna witnesses, send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ the necessary clerical assistance in the prosecution of such investigation.

So as to make the resolution read:

Whereas it has been charged that the dye industry is controlled by a combination of corporations and that it is in fact a monopoly, and that in order to maintain such monopoly and obtain an embargo against the importation of competing dyes, has employed agents, attorneys, and lobbyists to influence Congress in behalf of special legislation in the interest of such dye monopoly: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, or any subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized and instructed to investigate the charge that the dye industry is controlled by a combination of corporations which is in fact a monopoly and has employed agents, attorneys, and lobbyists to influence Congress in behalf of special legislation in the interest of such monopoly, and report its findings to the Senate, together with such recommendations as it may deem appropriate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I offer the amendment to the resolution which I send to the desk. I ask that it may be read, and I then desire to be heard upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey.

The reading clerk read as follows:

On page 3, after the word "monopoly," in line 18, it is proposed to insert a semicolon and the following:

"to investigate the activities and methods of importers of dyes from Germany, and their agents, attorneys, and lobbyists to influence Congress in behalf of special legislation, and to investigate the dye and chemical industries of the United States, and the supply and distribution methods, within the United States and elsewhere, of the German dye and chemical industries, with a view to recommending proper legislation."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I have no desire to prevent an investigation by the Senate of the United States of any abuses by any combination of capital or any industry in this country. If such abuses exist or there is a belief that they exist, it is the duty of those who suspect such mischief to see to it that an investigation shall be made.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator state the effect of his amendment on the resolution? I have heard it read, but I could not tell from the reading just what the effect would be on the original resolution.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I shall be very glad to do so in the course of my remarks, if the Senator is willing to wait until that time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield.

Mr. KING. While I believe that the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey is incongruous with the resolution before the Senate and introduces into the proposed investigation a matter which is entirely foreign to the purposes of the resolution, yet if the Senator desires to have the investigation broadened and an incongruous investigation made I have no objection, and I accept the amendment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I think I can show that the amendment I have suggested is entirely relevant to the purposes of the proposed inquiry and investigation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield; I wish to be courteous to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I merely wanted to state to the Senator that I accepted his amendment. If he does not desire me to accept it, I withdraw the tender.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is perfectly agreeable to me if the Senator is willing to accept the amendment. I thought he was about to object to it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator has no right to accept it; the Senate has a right to vote on it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I simply desire to be heard upon this subject. I intend to oppose the resolution, because I believe at this time it is unnecessary and unwarranted and that it will interfere with the great national defense policy of this country.

I believe that the motive behind the resolution is antagonistic to an industry that is very necessary to the national defense, an industry which at this time is prostrate and practically paralyzed by reason of the fact that it is uncertain as to what the policy of the Congress will be, and those interested in it are not willing to take the ordinary business chances owing to the antagonism of certain Senators in this body. I believe, further, Mr. President, that the menace of a dye monopoly does not exist, but that the great menace that exists is that Germany will again control the dye business in this country and destroy the American industry which was fostered and built up during the war.

It has been stated that there is a dye monopoly. I am informed that an attack has been made on the du Pont interests, and it is charged that they constitute the monopoly. Mr. President, I know nothing of the du Pont interest; I know nothing of the general dye interests of the country. I have been informed that the du Pont interests are limited to 17 per cent of the dye production of the United States; that the National Aniline Co. controls, perhaps, 25 per cent, and that the remaining 60 per cent is in the hands of from 200 to 300 independent chemical concerns. There are at the present time in my State 204 independent chemical dye plants, and I have in my hand, and desire to insert in the RECORD, a list of those plants. In capital they vary from $5,000 to a million dollars. They are absolutely independent of any dye monopoly. At the beginning of the war there were a few chemical plants in this country, and when it was found that Germany had prepared herself for the World War and practically had a monopoly of the dyes and a monopoly of war munitions, these plants were employed in making munitions of war. They were augmented by other factories that were built for that purpose; and if it had not been for the genius and energy of these men during the war the Allies across the sea would have had no war munitions, no powder, and no materials with which to confront the attack of the Germans. As a result of the genius and energy manifested not only in my State but all over this country, these plants sprang up, and it was by reason of their efforts that civilization was saved.

I ask that the list of these plants be placed in the RECORD to show that there is a very large independent chemical interest in this country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I am not opposing this resolution for any sordid purpose, to protect or defend any interest in my State. I am opposing it because I believe harassing and interfering with an industry of this character that is so essential for national defense is not only unnecessary but reprehensible, particularly when the agents of the German interests are now here again in this Capitol. Their agents are in this country. Their lawyers are here, trying to gain advantage in order that Germany may again capture this industry. Therefore I believe that the concern of this Congress should be to ascertain, in a fair and impartial way, methods whereby this industry shall be fostered, and methods whereby a return of German domination may be prevented. That is the patriotic duty of the Senators in this body; not by carping criticism, not by unfair attack, not by creating a false public opinion, to try and destroy this industry, because I suspect that back of those attacks are the sinister interests of our late enemy, Germany.

Now, let us see. The German methods prior to this war, from the standpoint of the dye industry and of war munitions, made this country prostrate. The history of our unpreparedness is known to everyone; but as a member of the Military Affairs Committee I made a study of certain phases of American statesmanship, so called, of the attitude of men in and out of Congress toward national preparedness for the past 40 years, and it is a continuous record of neglect, of lack of vision, of indifference toward national safety. I think it was immediately after the Spanish-American War, which showed that this country was unprepared, and caused an excessive loss of life by reason of such unpreparedness that William Jennings Bryan took as his campaign issue antimilitarism, anti-imperialism, basing his theory upon the principle that we should not have colonies in Porto Rico and the Philippines; and he went about this country giving an evangelical discourse entitled "The Prince of Peace." Sincere and well meaning, a lover of peace, is Mr. Bryan; but by reason of that school of thought he created in this country a sentiment against all measures of national defense, against all measures of preparedness. The great heart of America beats for peace at all times; but that propaganda created a blindness in statesmen and in candidates for office, who yielded to that sentiment rather than take the more courageous and nobler course by showing the people of this country that safety lay in proper means of national defense; and down through the years the same policy was pursued. We saw appropriations for the Army and the Navy cut down. We saw an absolute opposition to the creation of a merchant marine and absolutely no attention paid to the development of aircraft as a means of attack.

When Germany invaded Belgium this country, anxious regarding its safety, became aroused. At the same time men like Lord Roberts issued a warning in the House of Parliament; our own Gen. Leonard Wood, with a prophetic vision, stated that a German conflict with this country could not be prevented, and urged that this country prepare. Yet our President, Mr. Wilson, said, "There should be no hysteria; we are amply prepared"; and Mr. Bryan, the Secretary of State, said, "We can raise a million men overnight," expecting them, of course, to fight with their naked fists the next morning; and Mr. Wilson said that "we should be neutral in thought as well as in action," and in opposing the policy of preparedness he said that we would not enter this conflict, "we were too proud to fight." Notwithstanding the fact that the conflagration was going on in Europe and scorching our faces, we continued to resist all means of national preparedness. Even when the Lusitania was sunk statesmen in this body attempted to condone that great offense against civilization and humanity, stating that it was America's fault for allowing its citizens to go on that ship; but the people of America woke up when all over this broad land, in every city and hamlet, was heard the sound of marching feet. They knew better than so-called statesmen that civilization was in danger, and they demanded that our Government officials inaugurate a program of preparedness.

So much for our preparation. When we entered the war, what was the situation? Did we not have to go out in the open market and buy civilian overcoats and blankets in order to protect our troops in the camps; and did we not have to rely upon the Allies for our ordnance and our arms and our merchant ships with which to send the men to the other side? That was the record of this war. There was no lack of bravery or courage. There was preparedness there by the American people; but for 40 years the Government had neglected every means of national defense.

But there was another implement of war that had been disregarded and lost sight of. For 40 years the textile industries in this country had opposed a protective tariff on dyes and chemicals. I have read the record; you can read it yourselves, and see how these textile industries, particularly one great industry in New Hampshire, had opposed the protection of our dye industry in this country; how the head of that industry organized the opposition and appeared before the tariff committees, urging that no tariff protection be given to this great industry. For 40 years that condition had existed, and there was no dye industry in this country when the war broke out.

Col. Wood, who changed the specifications of the Army uniform while in the Quartermaster Department and put shoddy in it, has been the chief high priest and prophet in his opposition to a protective tariff or any protection of the dye industry in this country; and we actually were manufacturing shoddy stuff and putting it on our soldiers over there until Gen. Pershing cabled his protest, and Gen. Goethals ordered that a sufficient quantity of virgin wool be put in the uniform and demanded that it be made of proper weight to protect our soldiers; but these were the interests that prevented the establishment of a dye industry in this country.

What was the result? No one in this country knew of the development of that death-dealing gas. We had no dye organization, no chemical organization. Our scientists and chemists had not been encouraged; and one fatal day, when the Canadians and the English and the French were attacking the Germans at Ypres, a new, hellish device was launched upon them, and those men were stricken down by the thousands. That is the answer to the men who are trying to-day to prevent the establishment of a dye industry in this country. Look at these men in the hospitals, suffering from the gas attacks. Look at the men coughing their lungs out in the hospitals of this country, and then hark back to the 40 years of opposition to the development of this industry.

Now, the same agents who encouraged the textile industries to oppose a proper protective tariff on the dyes of this country all through those 40 years are here again, fighting the same battle, with the same alliances, trying to prevent this dye embargo, which would prevent Germany from restoring herself and gaining domination in this country. The same representatives of the Badische and the great German monopoly are here in this city pleading that something be done which will not prevent their enjoying the same benefits and the same opportunities they had before.

Mr. President, it is not the material interests of my State, or the material interests of any one, that I am thinking about. The issue involved is more momentous than that. When I came here to-day I prayed God that I might be able to present to the Senate the great danger there is in harassing and discouraging this industry in this country. If there are abuses, they can be corrected in another way than by an antagonistic attitude.

There are means of finding out fairly and impartially what the true situation is regarding this great subject. It is a technical subject. It is one that can not be understood in a superficial way. The great Judiciary Committee, with the ablest lawyers in this body upon it, is engaged in other business of the Senate, other activities. Have the members of that committee the time properly to investigate and examine into this question?

Mr. President, it should be an impartial and a fair investigation. Senate investigations are not always fair. The danger that lies in an investigation of this character is that a false public opinion may be created, because we all have the same failing. When we are on a committee, we like to have our names on the front pages of the newspapers. These investigations are not investigations; they are inquisitions. The rules of evidence are disregarded. Each member of the committee becomes a prosecuting attorney, and I have seen many investigations where there was no opportunity to present any evidence in rebuttal. I say now, after the experience we have had in this war, that it is our duty to see that only the fairest sort of an investigation is made. I believe this great question of commerce should be taken up before the Department of Justice and the Department of Commerce, not by this body.

I spoke of the culmination of our disastrous protective policy on the dye industry. I said it reached its culmination in the gas attack at Ypres. Let me read a description of that attack in a book entitled "The Riddle of the Rhine," by Victor Lefelure, who was an officer of the Crown of Italy, a fellow of the Chemical Society. He writes under the head of "German Surprise, Ypres, April, 1915, to the Somme, August, 1916," as follows:

The critical factor of surprise in war was never nearer decisive success than on April 22, 1915. Of this, the occasion of the first German gas attack at Ypres, Field Marshal Sir J. D. P. French stated:

"Following a heavy bombardment, the enemy attacked the French division at about 5 p. m., using asphyxiating gases for the first time. Aircraft reported that at about 5 p. m. thick yellow smoke had been seen issuing from the German trenches between Langemarke and Bixschote. What follows almost defies description. The effect of these poisonous gases was so virulent as to render the whole of the line held by the French division mentioned above practically incapable of any action at all. It was at first impossible for anyone to realize what had actually happened. The smoke and fumes hid everything from sight, and hundreds of men were thrown into a comatose or dying condition, and within an hour the whole position had to be abandoned, together with about 50 guns. I wish particularly to repudiate any idea of attaching the least blame to the French division for this unfortunate incident."

The enemy just missed colossal success, rendered possible by the use of an entirely new war method, one contrary to engagements entered into by them at The Hague convention.

There were elements in this first gas attack which were absent even from the situation created by our first use of tanks. Unfamiliarity amongst the troops, or the staff, for that matter, created an atmosphere of unparalleled confusion. Men attempted to protect themselves by burying their mouths and nostrils in the loose earth. Those chemists on the spot not immediately struck down made frantic efforts to bring up supplies of any suitable and available chemical or material which might assist resistance and movement in the affected zone. Paying every homage to the heroic sacrifices and brave actions which characterized the allied resistance, we can not ignore the fact that morale must have been very severely shaken locally, and that a general disquiet and uneasiness must have permeated the whole front until measures were known to be effectively in progress, not only for protection but for retaliation. The enemy had but to exploit the attack fully to break through to the channel ports, but failed to do so. The master mind behind this new and deadly attack was not, let us remember, that of a soldier. It was very strongly rumored that this monstrous conception and its execution were due to one, or, at the most, two, renowned German professors. The first hammer blow in the enemy chemical campaign was a two-party conspiracy led by world-famous scientists and the powerful I. G., with the German army, unconvinced but expectant, little more than a willing dupe.

The Interessen Gesellschaft is the "I. G.," the great monopoly of Germany. They are here now. Their interests are here. They were the people who conceived the dastardly gas attack at Ypres, when at The Hague convention every civilized nation announced that it would refuse to employ such methods.

The point I make is that Germany was organized and is organized now. In two days she can equip her hundred thousand men with this deadly gas. We were not organized. We were unfamiliar with the formulæ and methods; and yet we are going to place the control of this industry and all of the scientific research back in German hands unless we absolutely refuse, through an embargo, ever to allow Germany again to dominate and control our market.

Mr. President, I stated that the same methods were being employed. I understand that there are agents now for Kuttroff & Pickhardt Co. (Inc.), who represent the great Badische Aniline Co. in this country, who are operating. Their agents are here and their lawyers are here. I can mention their names if anybody wants me to. Who are Kuttroff & Pickhardt Co. (Inc.)? I want this to go in the RECORD.

The facts show that Mr. Kuttroff organized the business in 1870–71. In 1878 the partnership took in the business of the Badische Anilin & Soda Fabrik of Germany. In 1900 the present firm of Kuttroff & Pickhardt Co. (Inc.) was organized and took over the established business. This corporation did business at the same place in New York until 1906, when it was combined with the Continental Color & Chemical Co. The Continental Co. was consolidated with the business of the Badische Co. of New York and the German Bayer Co. In 1907 the Badische Co. of New York was incorporated and took over the assets and business of the Continental Color & Chemical Co.

Business was conducted between the companies from 1873 until 1917 by various sundry agreements. Money was loaned by the German company to the American company and they participated in the profits. One accounting of the records shows the German company realized as high as 78 per cent of the earnings of the Kuttroff & Pickhardt Co.

The records show that Kuttroff & Pickhardt Co. asked for and received permission from the German corporation to raise salaries of the people in the American corporation as late as December, 1916. A translation of this letter, dated December 19, 1916, from the American corporation to the German corporation was sent at the time by the submarine Deutschland, and a reply was made by radio to the Kuttroff & Pickhardt people in New York.

The firm of Kuttroff & Pickhardt Co. (Inc.) were the consignees of the cargo of dyes brought over by the submarine Deutschland, and a remittance was made to the German corporation arbitrarily by Kuttroff without the action of the board of directors.

These few facts as well as the various agreements and arrangements, all contained in the official records of the Government, show that there was a close and existing relation as well as an inseparable interest between the Kuttroff people and the parent company in Germany.

Mr. President, I realize that Germany, in order to be restored, must be allowed to do business in the marts of the world. I have no objection to the descendants of Germans in this country, and people of German parentage who have taken the oath of allegiance to our Government, doing business here. I have no objection to the German firms engaged in industrial pursuits which can not in a moment be turned into implements of war, as the dye industry can, engaging in business in this country. They have the right to do so, and under our peace treaty they should be permitted to do so. But I say, Mr. President, with the record of this war, with 10,000,000 men under the sod, with millions of men suffering on account of the dastardly methods of the German dye industry, as long as I live I shall fight against their ever getting a foothold in this country. That is why I feel that it is unwise and unwarranted to unduly harass by congressional investigation an industry which at the present time is prostrate and which should be encouraged rather than attacked.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield, though I have not finished.

Mr. NORRIS. I hope the Senator will let me ask a question. I am doing it entirely for information. I am very much impressed by what the Senator has said. I do not understand why, in view of the amendment proposed to the resolution, there should be an objection to all the truth being known that a fair investigation would bring out. I know that the Senator thinks we would not have a fair investigation by the Judiciary Committee, but the only thing he has suggested in lieu of it is that it ought to be investigated by the Department of Justice.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No; by the Department of Commerce.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator think that the Department of Commerce would give us the facts any better than the Judiciary Committee would?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes, Mr. President. I do not challenge the fairness of the members of the Judiciary Committee. I think I clearly outlined in a previous part of my speech that I was not criticizing the members of the Judiciary Committee or their fairness and impartiality. But this is a technical question; it involves so largely our national safety; it is one that will require such a length of time to properly investigate that it should be placed in the hands of a body who will have the time and will devote their entire time to an investigation of this character.

I will say further to the Senator from Nebraska that if I did not believe at this time that an investigation of this character would encourage the German interests in Germany and here, and be misunderstood throughout the commercial world, when every one of our allies has created a selective embargo and forbidden, except through permission of their tariff commission, the introduction of German dyes in their country, which we have not done—if I did not believe that an attack of this kind would be misunderstood and that it is antagonistic—I most certainly should not oppose it. I am not opposing, really. I am pointing out the great danger of giving any encouragement to German interests and the great danger in superficially investigating this great subject. I am doing it from a sense of patriotic duty and not merely because there are dye interests in my State.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I certainly do not question the Senator's patriotic service or intention, and I am not saying that he is at all wrong, but I am one of the Members of the Senate, and I take it that there are a great many others, who care for nothing on this subject except the truth and light. As I understand it, the charges really made by those who favor the original resolution are that there is a lobby using various methods on one side of the controversy, and that the Senator charges that there is a similar lobby representing German interests who are doing something similar on different lines. Now, if that be true, and either one or both of those lobbies are resorting to means that are unfair or propaganda that is untrue, and we are not getting the whole truth, it seems to me that an investigation of the proposition would necessarily have to be undertaken by a committee of either the House or the Senate.

The Department of Commerce would not investigate something that pertained to any scheme to secure legislation. I do not understand that an investigation by the Department of Commerce would under any condition go into the question of whether there is a lobby here trying to control Congress on either side of this proposition. If we are going to investigate that at all it might better come through the House or the Senate, it seems to me.

Personally, I do not accept the very grave charges that I have heard made here from time to time about this lobby. Whether those charges are justified I would like to know. I think the country would like to know, and the Senate and the House would like to know, what the truth is about that.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not know anything about any lobby. I know that a number of manufacturers of my State have come here and have discussed with me the question of their business interests and expressed anxiety over the antagonistic attitude of Congress and some of the misstatements that have been made, and I feel that they have a perfect right to do that.

Mr. NORRIS. I think so, but would not an investigation disclose whether those statements are wrong or not?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not think there has been sufficient evidence presented to warrant an investigation. I do not believe there is a lobby, and I do not believe that the investigation will prove that there is one. I think that the Senate has too much else to do. If there is mischief, if there are evils and abuses properly shown, they can be investigated, but I do not think the charges which have been made warrant any investigation.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator says that business men in his State who are engaged in the business have seen him.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Have they not a right to do so?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly they have a right to do so. The Senator is getting a little too touchy. It seems to me the Senator insinuates that a man who wants to get light on the matter is doing something that is a great sin.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I beg the Senator's pardon. I had no intention of that.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me when the Senator says his own constituents say that the statements which have been made are not warranted that a fair investigation, if that be the truth, would vindicate his constituents.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. But does the Senator believe an investigation should be had of every statement that is made by a constituent?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not; but I have heard statements made on the floor of the Senate in discussion of the so-called emergency tariff bill that were very startling. I voted for that tariff bill. I desire to protect this industry if it can be done within reason, but there were a good many things said which, if on investigation I found were true, would cause me to hesitate before I would vote to support or continue indefinitely at least the law that we enacted. If, on the other hand, the Senator is right, if the investigation develops that he is right, I would go just as far as he would to protect it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator that it is necessary to provide some means of protection. Of course, that is the whole burden of my speech. I am looking at the broader and larger question of the danger of attacking, in an unfair way and through a superficial investigation, this great industry. What I fear is that the investigation will not be thorough, and that it will be undertaken with prejudice. I feel that personally. I have no evidence of it, and yet I am not seeking to protect any interest or any concern. I have no interest in it beyond the general policy that I believe this Government should pursue of, in a friendly and impartial way, informing itself of the facts regarding this industry. This is an investigation proposed to be made by the Government under certain charges, under an indictment, and those who have made those charges will be in control of that investigation.

Mr. NORRIS. Why does the Senator say that?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has made the attack and will undoubtedly be on the committee.

Mr. MOSES. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator from Utah is not even a member of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. NORRIS. No; he is not a member of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Then I withdraw that statement. I am mistaken as to that. Nevertheless, the Senator, of course, will appear.

Mr. NORRIS. That is his right, and he ought to appear.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly.

Mr. STERLING. If I may be permitted a word as a member of the Judiciary Committee and as a member of the subcommittee which made the report in favor of a resolution calling for an investigation of the dye industry, I simply wish to say that I have served on a good many subcommittees which have conducted hearings, and I have never yet served on a subcommittee which did not give full opportunity to both sides to be heard.

The Senator from New Jersey awhile ago made the statement that nothing would be heard in rebuttal. I suppose by rebuttal he means nothing could be heard in denial or in explanation of the charges that are made and on which the investigation is founded. I think nothing can be further from the truth than that. Opportunity is always given—that is my experience at least—to the other side to be heard.

So far as the investigation being in control of anybody is concerned, it is not in control of anybody except the committee itself or the subcommittee which has immediate charge of the investigation or the hearing. Of course, the person making the charges has an opportunity to appear before the committee and make his statements and give his testimony, but beyond that he does not control the action or the decision of the committee.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator knows that I did not state that this would be an unfair hearing, and that those appearing in denial would not be heard. If the Senator will recall my remarks, I said that many of these investigations were inquisitorial, and, by reason of that fact, that time could not be given to a proper hearing of all the evidence, and I still adhere to that statement.

Mr. President, speaking of the situation regarding the attitude of the textile mills of this country I referred to the tariff hearings before the Ways and Means Committee of the House in the Sixtieth Congress 1908-9, vol. 1, schedule A, chemicals, oils, and paints. On page 146 is a memorial and petition in opposition to any advance in duties on coal tars, chemicals, and dyes. The memorial is dated at Washington, December 20, 1908, signed by a number of consumers, headed by the Amoskeag Manufacturing Co. This petition protested against any advance in the rates of duty on coal-tar dyes or colors under section 15 of the then existing tariff on the ground that it would:

(a) Increase the cost of manufacturing colored cotton goods in the United States;
(b) Increase the price to the consumer in the United States;
(c) In the case of export trade an advance in the cost of any of our raw materials adds to our burdens and minimizes our opportunity to compete with foreign cotton manufacturers in foreign markets.

Mr. President, that opposition, as I have previously stated, by these interests existed prior to the war; but during the war the German market which had been open to them was denied to them, and they immediately began to appeal to the chemical and dye industries of this country to provide them with the necessary dyes in order that they might maintain their plants in operation and keep their operatives employed. Now, however, the embargo caused by the war is over and the dyes from Germany are now or are soon to be available at famine prices. Those dyes are produced in a country that recognizes no 8-hour law; they are produced at wages, especially considering rates of exchange, so far below our own that the goods may be brought here at a price that makes it practically prohibitive for the American manufacturers to compete; and now some of these men are suddenly opposing protection through a dye embargo designed to prevent the importation of those dyes and to foster our own industry here. That is the unfairness of the position, although I may say that many of the cotton manufacturers and other manufacturers in the country recognize that the patriotic policy to pursue is to support any proper legislation which will give the American industry an opportunity to live.

Now, I wish to consider for a moment the relative aspects of the prewar American situation. I read from the book which I hold in my hands, which is entitled "The Riddle of the Rhine," a copy of which I secured the other day. I was very much impressed with the statements which it contains, and I think they are fairly accurate. In regard to the prewar American situation, it states:

According to fairly well-known facts, confirmed by the reports of the two American officials mentioned above, the American prewar organic chemical industry consisted of little more than a series of small assembling plants. Although enormous supplies of coal-tar products were available, yet the dye intermediates derived from them were not made in America, but imported from Germany. After various attempts to establish the dye industry, it seemed at one time, about 1880, to have definitely taken root, but, within the space of five years, there were only four dye-producing establishments remaining.

In every instance the manufacture was almost immediately brought to an end by German price cutting. The same source reveals the direct and indirect methods used by Germany to prevent, at all costs, the development of an independent organic chemical industry. There are many pointed examples of the direct method, and we will glance at the case of salicylic acid. This is a very important chemical, used not only for certain important drugs, but also as an intermediate for dyes and photographic chemicals. In 1903 the United States possessed five manufacturers of this product. In 10 years time three of these had failed, and one of the survivors was a mere branch of a German house.

During this fatal 10 years the product was being sold in that country at a price 25 per cent lower than in Germany. The manipulation of the prices of the other products of the German monopoly enabled them by such methods to maintain it. Many other examples, including such important products as bromine, oxalic acid, and aniline, could be quoted to show the results of the German price-cutting policy. The direct significance of bromine for chemical warfare must be borne in mind.

Mr. President, I have spoken of the German methods employed after the war. It has been repeatedly said that Germany is prostrate, that she has not the ships, that she has not the financial credit necessary to establish her foreign trade and commerce. I want to read into the RECORD a letter upon commercial questions purporting to have been written by Stroheker. I say "purporting to have been written," for it purports to be a copy appearing in the Idea Nationale. I have cabled to Italy, to our ambassador, to verify this publication. I think, however, it is fairly authentic and accurate.

I am informed that shortly after the appearance of this publication Italy passed a dye-licensing act. It seems as though it was good national policy for her to do so, after she procured the information contained in this communication from the German counselor to the minister for foreign affairs at Berlin, which is a report from the commercial attaché at Rome to his Government.

GERMAN EMBASSY AT ROME,
No. 1784, GENERAL PRIVATE,
Rome, 25th May, 1921.

To the MINISTER FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Berlin:

I reply to the invitation contained in circular of 13th May to all commercial attachés to report to your ministry as to the situation and our activity and our commercial development abroad, and I have the honor to report as follows:

The figures of German commerce in Italy show that after the armistice our traders were not inactive in reconquering the Italian market compared with France, England, and the United States and maintaining our supremacy, but that does not mean that we have reached the state of your circulars of 20.8.1920 and 29.8.1920.

In order that we may create for ourselves a favorable political situation, taking advantage of the malcontent of the Italian people, and especially of the Nationalist and Nittian Parties against the powers of the Entente, a political situation which might in due course be favorable to us when Germany should be faced by fresh complications, it is necessary to strengthen this discontent in order to consolidate our situation through economic action.

To this end the point at which we have arrived is only a quarter of the way. We must create such economic interests and bonds with Italy that whatever happens Italy will have to follow our political lead.

First of all, it is necessary that a systematic supply of German goods be sent here, even below cost price to a considerable extent. Inundating the Italian market with German goods, we will not only have a place sympathetic to Germany, because, as many of our agents and commercial representatives have verified, Italian consumers gladly accept cheap articles, but we will also create a situation for Italian industry which will render any continuation of activity impossible. This without doubt will cause such a crisis that, besides keeping Italy in constant agitation, will enable use to become the sole masters of the peninsular trade, the more so as, from our information as to French activity in Italy, it appears that the French fear the outbreak of a revolution here which might cause them similar losses to those suffered in Russia.

The inclosed copy of a report by Sir Capel Cure, British commercial attaché, proves that the British, too, fear the unstable nature of the social situation in Italy.

Further, such situation would enable us to purchase the Italian industries at a very low rate, which would be the key of the situation, since it would also allow us to control trade between Italy and the Balkans in such a way that Italy would not compete with us for those markets. (See circular Oct. 30, 1920, regarding Italo-Jugo-Slav treaty.) This, of course, will happen as soon as Italy is forced to close down.

We have before us a varied field of development in Italian industry, viz, trade in rubber, Fiat, Spa, besides all the tire factories and motor-car engine factories which are already in a state of acute crisis on account of the huge German stocks of these lines sent to Italy.

The Siemens Schuckert already approached the Turin companies last September when the factories were occupied by the workmen, but without result. On my advice, the Siemens has already arranged for the absorption of the Fiat through a combination, Stinnes-Fiat, in the Alpinen and through the purchase by the Deutsch Bank, which has an interest in the Siemens, of the shares which are in the hands of the Banca Commerciale Italiana, amounting to 90,000 Alpinen shares and 100,000 Fiat shares, owned by said bank.

I shall only read portions of the letter, but ask that it may be printed in the RECORD in its entirety.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Passing on, the writer of the letter states:

I have had a promise from the Italian cotton spinners of the possibility of action on their part against possible provisions of the Italian Government. As authorized by you, for my part, I have promised that any such action will be compensated by the dispatch of textile machines from Germany at very low prices.

It must not be forgotten, however, that the Italian textile industry, too, offers a field for economic development for Germany in Italy, whether because they are at present going through a period of crisis or because they obstruct our path toward the East. I understand that in the economic treaties which Italy is on the point of concluding with Jugoslavia she demands that the Jugo-Slavs shall acquire 200,000 quintals (2,000 tons) of textiles per annum in Italy; and it seems that this proposal has been received with pleasure by the Jugo-Slavs, since as a matter of fact the Italian cotton spinners have known how to penetrate that market.

* * * * * * *

Then we have at our disposal the Italian wealth of lignite. The Italians do not know how to get the most out of this and almost treat it as a thing of little value. On the contrary, it is a matter of 300,000,000 tons of which, as I have already reported, sub. n. 178 ND, only 3,000 000 tons per annum are used, whilst 115,000,000 tons per year could be got, as the deposits are estimated to be more than 35 meters deep.

Add that by distillation, a thousand tons of mineral oil could be obtained, since lignite has a percentage of 25 per cent of the components of such oil. The deposits of bituminous schist, valued at 115 000,000 tons, with 12 and up to 18 per cent of nafta, are worthy of notice, and these two are in a very slightly developed state, which may be attributed to lack of means on the part of the owners.

The Consortium of Chemical Products of Berlin, the Deutsche Bank, and the Discount Gesellschaft are already in treaty with various Italian groups.

As will be seen from this explanation, there is much to do in Italy, but action must be guided by the following rules in order to avoid clashing with Italian susceptibility:

(1) The Deutsche Italienische Vereinig should be able to continue to bring its influence to bear.

Instructions must be given to the Deutsch Italienische Vereinig so that its bulletins shall be inspired to draw attention to the lack of Italian products in Italy, the damage resulting from such lack, and the attempts at economic penetration on the part of foreign countries. Such criterion must also inspire the newspaper campaign of said organization.

(2) The setting up in Milan, too, of an information office at the consulte general for Germany with the aim of following the labor movements in north Italy and to report to Germany in relation to these movements the necessity to send German material and products in order to increase the crisis.

(3) As to fuel it is necessary that after the refusal of the Italians of our offer to collaborate in the development of the lignite mines and for the supply of the market with fuel against facilities of German property which has been so sequestrated, our action shall be turned toward private individuals.

Mr. President, I have never read any letter relating to trade conditions which showed more careful design in an effort to capture commercial advantage than this letter. It shows the attitude of German business efficiency. It indicates that in every country on the face of the globe there are German agents and a German system fighting to get back this trade. It is perfectly right for a country to desire to have prosperous commercial conditions. It is right that any country should wish that her industries should be fostered and built up. No one has any complaint about that; but when we, by any act of ours here in this Congress, or by any policy, encourage the building up of an industry in another country which means ultimately the domination of our industry here or its destruction, I say that the patriotic policy for us to pursue is to fight every effort that is made to discourage the industry in this country.

I hate any methods that are dishonest—I think my colleagues know that—and I try to pursue in my public life an independent attitude. It is true that I represent a great industrial State. It is true that these chemical industries have been planted there to the extent of over 200, many of them created during the war. It is true that the financial interests of my State are large. I want to guard them fairly and jealously. I believe that is my duty. I do not hesitate to oppose any policy of those interests that I believe is contrary to the public welfare or any dishonest methods that they may have. My conscience is perfectly clear. If there have been lobby methods employed here that are to be criticized, if evils have crept in that should be eliminated from this Capitol, no one is more heartily in favor of kicking them out than I am; and if any corporation, the dye industry included, is guilty of trade abuses or trade agreements that are against the public welfare, I believe they should be eliminated, but through the proper instrumentality, the Department of Justice, which is even now prosecuting some corporations in my State for such alleged abuses. But, Mr. President, I feel that unless those who are back of this resolution are absolutely sure that the mischief exists—and I know nothing of it—they are taking a great chance in discouraging these business men who to-day are refusing to invest more capital, whose plants to-day are idle, because of the existing uncertainty as to the protection which will be accorded them.

It is charged that some of these concerns made money. Yes; they paid part of it out in excess-profits taxes; but, anticipating a longer duration of the war, those profits beyond what they paid the Government did not go into the pockets of the stockholders, in many instances, in these small independent plants. They went back into the expansion of the plants to equip them for a longer duration of the war, to equip them for peace pursuits after the war, and the enlargement of this industry which had been fostered and recaptured from Germany, and in which these corporations had the right to expect that they might continue under the protection of their Government. To-day these plants are idle. They will not take the chance with the antagonistic attitude of Congress, and the general attack that has been made upon this industry, and the feeling that this great, powerful German combine will again come over here and undersell, will come over here and capture this industry again, unless they have the protection of the Government, and unless only those dyes are admitted which they can not manufacture at the present time.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is speaking of plants being idle. Would he mind explaining, if he understands, why they are idle? Is it not true that at the present time there is a complete embargo, and that no dyes can be imported under existing law at all except by a license?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is perfectly true; and I did not refer to that condition as being due to the present situation, because the policy at this time is an embargo. I said that these plants were idle because they would not take the chance of expanding their plants, buying more raw materials, and going on manufacturing, unless they were assured that that policy was permament.

Mr. NORRIS. If they are waiting now, with a complete embargo, and not doing anything, what would they demand? Would it be a guaranty on the part of Congress that the embargo should continue indefinitely? What do they demand?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, of course, the House in the tariff bill has defeated the permanent embargo, but if the Senator will recall, immediately after the war there was introduced the Longworth selective embargo bill, which was before this body; and it died, was talked to death here. That was the policy that the dye industries of this country hoped might be established—the selective license policy, which prohibited any importations from Germany except those dyes that could not be manufactured in this country, and opened the door only wide enough to permit the entrance from Germany of the dyes which our manufacturers could not produce.

I may say, in passing, that recognizing the great danger to national safety, England and France and Italy, I am informed, have passed similar acts. I have no general information regarding this subject. I only see these manufacturers in my State from time to time. I have studied the matter and have discussed it with them and have been given general information regarding the dye industry throughout the world; but I know nothing of their particular business, except in one instance. I know of one factory which was started during the war by a chemist, a neighbor and friend. He had accumulated a little money, and he built a little plant, a frame building not any larger than the area of the Senate Chamber, and he made one color. It was one color that was extremely difficult to make, and by continued experimentation he found a method of making a fast color of this shade. He made considerable money, $25,000 or $30,000, I should guess, beyond what he put in. He put in about $25,000. We came to the end of the war, and he was there with his plant and a certain amount of raw material. He was perfectly willing to meet the competition of the other plants in the State who had begun to manufacture the same thing that he had accomplished; but he said to me: "I am unwilling to go on unless the Government of the United States will say that Germany shall not import this color of mine. I can not compete with Germany." He said: "I am afraid to go on and put in more money because I would have to borrow the money to do it." That was just one illustration, and I think it quite completely reflects the situation all over the country.

Mr. President, as a means of national preparedness, this question has been before Congress. President Wilson, I think, twice has appeared and in messages called the attention of Congress to the necessity of protecting this industry. Secretary Weeks has publicly written, so have Secretary Denby and Gen. Pershing; and the President, Mr. Harding, has written to Mr. LONGWORTH, calling attention to the necessity through this embargo of protecting ourselves against German competition.

Mr. President, as I stated before, my position is that I believe it is entirely essential to the national defense, and I believe that we should not at this time in any way harass these interests.

President Wilson, coming back with the experience of the war, coming to Congress and urging Congress to adopt this policy, not to foster these industries or create monopolies but from the standpoint of national defense, said in his message of May 20, 1919:

> There are parts of our tariff system which need prompt attention. The experiences of the war have made it plain that in some cases too great reliance on foreign supply is dangerous, and that in determining certain parts of our tariff policy domestic considerations must be borne in mind which are political as well as economic. Among the industries to which special consideration should be given is that of the manufacture of dyestuffs and related chemicals. Our complete dependence upon German supplies before the war made the interruption of trade a cause of exceptional economic disturbance. The close relation between the manufacturer of dyestuffs, on the one hand, and of explosives and poisonous gases, on the other, moreover, has given the industry an exceptional significance and value.
> Although the United States will gladly and unhesitatingly join in the program of international disarmament, it will, nevertheless, be a policy of obvious prudence to make certain of the successful maintenance of many strong and well-equipped chemical plants. The German chemical industry, with which we will be brought into competition, was and may well be again a thoroughly knit monopoly capable of exercising a competition of a peculiarly insidious and dangerous kind.
>
> The United States should, moreover, have the means of properly protecting itself whenever our trade is discriminated against by foreign nations, in order that we may be assured of that equality of treatment which we hope to accord and to promote the world over.

Note this:

> Our tariff laws as they now stand provide no weapon of retaliation in case other Governments should enact legislation unequal in its bearing on our products as compared with the products of other countries.

Mr. President, to-day France, England, and Italy do not allow the importation of German dyes except through the selective-license system, as I understand. The industry in this country is not protected, and has not been protected, in a similar manner, and with all the experiences of the war, with the experience of the deadly gas attack, which we knew nothing of and which our chemists knew nothing of and with which we are not organized to compete, having to build plants and create the facilities, to-day we are simply slipping right back in the old groove, and I venture to predict that unless this body legislates against this German monopoly and ceases to harass and interfere with the American manufacture of dyes, inside of a year or a year and a half Germany will completely control this market.

I believe that, Mr. President, and that is the reason I believe it is unwise at this time, although I am not opposing this resolution, to go into an extended investigation, which I may go so far as to say I think may be somewhat unfriendly, as the result of which a false public opinion and sentiment may be created against this industry, which is so essential not only for commercial prosperity but also for national defense.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, before the Senator closes his argument, as far as I am able to see, at least, the Senator has no reason to say that this investigation is going to be unfriendly. He must admit that the remedy is a remarkable one. I am not disputing that it may be necessary, because I do not know, but if we are to deviate from our ordinary tariff policy, and go beyond any protective principle, and levy an embargo to keep out entirely the competing article, there must be some good and sufficient reason for it. If it is necessary as a matter of defense; then we ought to do it; but in order to ascertain whether that radical step is necessary we ought to know all the facts, and I anticipate that is what this investigation will bring out.

If there were any reason to believe that it is going to be unfriendly, or that the Judiciary Committee would undertake to have a prejudicial or unbiased investigation of it, I would not want to vote for the resolution, of course. Nobody, I think, wants an unfair investigation. But we ought to know the facts.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the resolution itself is an indictment. Undoubtedly during the war there may have been cases where people were of the opinion that there were trade abuses; I do not know about that. I have been told that the Chemical Foundation, by reason of its control of patents, should be investigated. It was created to provide for the turning over to a private corporation of the various German patents in this country, to license them to the dye industry, the chemical factories, practically without controlling them, making them free to everyone, as I believe, in order that we might have, for the benefit of American industry, the secrets and formulæ which Germany formerly employed.

I have always believed that was a good policy. It has been criticized by some. I know nothing of any lobby which it is claimed exists. Information regarding it will not be detrimental, but when the textile industries want to buy at the lowest market and yet have protection themselves, and then bitterly oppose the protection of the dye industry, and we have a resolution which is an indictment and an open charge that a monopoly exists—taking all of this circumstantial evidence, with the efforts of the textile interests to encourage German imports against the interest of our own industry, I think I am warranted in saying that the resolution is unfriendly. That is my position.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly its source is unfriendly and has been proclaimed so over and over again.

Mr. NORRIS. That is always true in an ordinary lawsuit, when it starts out. Anybody who starts it may be unfriendly, may be unreasonable, or he may be fair and reasonable; but when it comes to the court and the jury, they are not influenced by that, and in my judgment it is not right to say that the tribunal which is to make this investigation, the Judiciary Committee, presided over by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], will be moved one way or the other because some one happens to be prejudiced who makes a charge. Charges are usually made by men who are prejudiced, and that is the way we get the truth many times. If we have a fair tribunal to pass on the facts, then those who want the truth will be able to get it from that tribunal.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I simply want to say that I do not question in any way the members of the Judiciary Committee or their ability to conduct the investigation. The only point I raised was this, that a committee of Congress, with its members employed on other committees, and with the great business of this Congress, would not have the time to investigate a technical subject of this character.

Mr. NORRIS. Whether or not there have been unfair methods used on either side of this controversy, whether or not an embargo is too great a protection, and whether by means of that embargo there ought to be a continuance of that kind of protection, or a change of legislation, is entirely a legislative proposition, and nobody would investigate it except a legislative body. You would never get the Department of Justice, the Department of Commerce, or any other department to make an investigation unless, indeed, they were instructed to do so by law. You would not get them to go into the question as to the methods adopted by any concerns or any combination of men regarding legislation in Congress. That is something peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the legislative body, and that is the reason it ought to be done, if done at all, by a legislative committee.

APPENDIX.

REPORT OF THE GERMAN COMMERCIAL ATTACHÉ AT ROME TO HIS GOVERNMENT.

[We reproduce the document in its entirety.]

GERMAN EMBASSY AT ROME,
NO. 1784, GENERAL PRIVATE.
Rome, May 25, 1921.

To the MINISTER FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Berlin:

I reply to the invitation contained in circular of May 13 to all commercial attachés, to report to your ministry as to the situation, and our activity and our commercial development abroad, and I have the honor to report as follows:

The figures of German commerce in Italy show that after the armistice our traders were not inactive in reconquering the Italian market compared with France, England, and the United States and maintaining our supremacy, but that does not mean that we have reached the state of your circulars of August 20, 1920, and August 29, 1920.

In order that we may create for ourselves a favorable political situation, taking advantage of the malcontent of the Italian people, and especially of the Nationalist and Nittian Parties against the powers of the Entente, a political situation which might in due course be favorable to us when Germany should be faced by fresh complications, it is necessary to strengthen this discontent in order to consolidate our situation through economic action.

To this end the point at which we have arrived is only a quarter of the way. We must create such economic interests and bonds with Italy that whatever happens Italy will have to follow our political lead.

First of all, it is necessary that a systematic supply of German goods be sent here, even below cost price to a considerable extent. Inundating the Italian market with German goods, we will not only have a place sympathetic to Germany, because, as many of our agents and commercial representatives have verified, Italian consumers gladly accept cheap articles, but we will also create a situation for Italian industry which will render any continuation of activity impossible. This without doubt will cause such a crisis that, besides keeping Italy in constant agitation, will enable us to become the sole masters of the peninsula trade, the more so as, from our information as to French activity in Italy, it appears that the French fear the outbreak of a revolution here which might cause them similar losses to those suffered in Russia.

The inclosed copy of a report by Sir Capel Cure, British commercial attaché, proves that the British, too, fear the unstable nature of the social situation in Italy.

Further, such situation would enable us to purchase the Italian industries at a very low rate, which would be the key of the situation, since it would also allow us to control trade between Italy and the Balkans in such a way that Italy would not compete with us for those markets. (See circular Oct. 30, 1920, regarding Italo-Jugo-Slav treaty.) This, of course, will happen as soon as Italy is forced to close down.

We have before us a varied field of development in Italian industry, viz, trade in rubber, Fiat, Spa, besides all the tire factories and motor-car engine factories which are already in a state of acute crisis on account of the huge German stocks of these lines sent to Italy.

The Siemens Schuckert already approached the Turin companies last September, when the factories were occupied by the workmen, but without result. On my advice the Siemens has already arranged for the absorption of the Fiat through a combination Stinnes-Fiat in the Alpinen and through the purchase by the Deutsch Bank, which has an interest in the Siemens, of the shares which are in the hands of the Banca Commerciale Italiana, amounting to 90,000 Alpinen shares and 100,000 Fiat shares, owned by said bank.

The transaction is on the way to completion and Messrs. Cavallini, Brunicardi, Trombetti, and Dante are backing it, to whom the Siemens will pay a percentage of 4½ per cent, as was decided at the meeting held in this embassy in September last. Then we have the dyeing trade in Italy, which, though in a precarious state of development, holds the promise of an assured future. It is, however, necessary that, in order to follow out in this branch, too, the method of peaceful destruction advised by me, the Italian Government should not take precautions to prevent the import of coloring matters from abroad, as otherwise it is certain that the Italian industry which, it appears to me, are seeking American capital to support them might assume a more solid position in the peninsular, a position which it would be more difficult to destroy.

I have had a promise from the Italian cotton spinners of the possibility of action on their part against possible provisions of the Italian Government. As authorized by you, for my part I have promised that any such action will be compensated by the dispatch of textile machines from Germany at very low prices.

It must not be forgotten, however, that the Italian textile industry, too, offers a field for economic development for Germany in Italy, whether because they are at present going through a period of crisis, or because they obstruct our path toward the east. I understand that in the economic treaties which Italy is on the point of concluding with Jugoslavia she demands that the Jugo-Slavs shall acquire 200,000 quintales (2,000 tons) of textiles per annum in Italy, and it seems that this proposal has been received with pleasure by the Jugo-Slavs, since, as a matter of fact, the Italian cotton spinners have known how to penetrate that market. Therefore, if we succeed in absorbing part of the Italian cotton industry—I have already made tentative proposals for the Rossi cotton mill and for the Prato factory, but up to the present I have had no result, and the negotiations have been passed on to the Schimmelpfeng Agency and to the office of Consul Oster—we could reduce Italian competition in the Balkans, where we could present our product as being Italian.

Then we have the metallurgical industry in Italy, and this is the most important of all, since the development which took place during the war is such that the matter must be taken into serious consideration.

In this connection I will refer to the matter again, pointing out that our participation in the Piombino establishments is assured. Messrs. Cavallini and Brunicardi are taking charge of the question of the Alti Forni (smelting furnaces) of Ports Ferraio in the interests of the firm of Krupp. They say that at the present moment the owners could ask 210,000,000 lire, but that if the present crisis continues even half that sum might be sufficient.

Then we have made an offer for the electric-railway workshops of Milan, a combination between the Pirelli and Eradania, and with the Cotton Transport Corsorzio, which could be absorbed, and offers regarding the fleet of Deutsche-Levant Linie, which could become an Italian navigation company.

The most important question is in fact that of the control of Italian fuel, which constitutes the integral part of Italian economic life.

The infiltration of the products of the A. E. G. into Italy has destroyed the industry in electrical materials which it will be easy to absorb, the more so as several members of that industry, indicated in my telegram No. 10878, assured me that in view of the business crisis those companies seek to obtain foreign capital.

If we assure a supply of electric material on the Italian market, we could obtain contracts for furnishing electric material for several hydro-electric works in constructions and for the State railways. But it is necessary for the German companies to understand the necessity of their branches in Italy remaining under the Italian name.

I have entered into agreement for the conclusion of contracts between the A. E. G. Siemens and the Societa Adriatica of electricity of the group Velpi-Negri for furnishing of the necessary material into the Veneto—that is to say turbo-alternators, turbines, pipes for the waterfall, and all the material—and the furnishing of the material as capital participation of said company, since these supplies are calculated at a value of over 8,000,000 lire.

This regarding white fuel.

Then, we have at our disposal the Italian wealth of lignite. The Italians do not know how to get the most out of this, and almost treat it as a thing of little value. On the contrary, it is a matter of 300,000,000 tons, of which, as I have already reported (sub. n. 178 ND), only 3,000,000 tons per annum are used, whilst 115,000,000 tons per year could be got, as the deposits are estimated to be more than 35 meters deep.

Add that by distillation a thousand tons of mineral oil could be obtained, since lignite has a percentage of 25 per cent of the components of such oil. The deposits of bituminous schist, valued at 115,000,000 tons, with 12 and up to 18 per cent of naftha, are worthy of notice; and these two are in a very slightly developed state, which may be attributed to lack of means on the part of the owners.

The Consortium of Chemical Products of Berlin, the Deutsche Bank, and the Discount Gesellschaft are already in treaty with various Italian groups.

As will be seen from this explanation, there is much to do in Italy, but action must be guided by the following rules, in order to avoid clashing with Italian susceptibility:

1. The Deutsche Italienische Vereinig should be able to continue to bring its influence to bear.

Instructions must be given to the Deutsche Italienische Vereinig so that its bulletins shall be inspired to draw attention to the lack of Italian products in Italy, the damage resulting from such lack, and the attempts at economic penetration on the part of foreign countries. Such criterion must also inspire the newspaper campaign of said organization.

2. The setting up in Milan, too, of an information office at the consulate general for Germany, with the aim of following the labor movements in north Italy and to report to Germany in relation to these movements the necessity to send German material and products in order to increase the crisis.

3. As to fuel, it is necessary that after the refusal of the Italians of our offer to collaborate in the development of the lignite mines and for the supply of the market with fuel against facilities of German property, which has been so sequestrated, our action shall be turned toward private individuals.

With respectful regards,

STROHEKER,
The Commercial Councilor.

[Idea Nazionale, Sunday, August 28, 1921.]

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, through the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], which I think is certain, those of us who have advocated this investigation are now assured of the powerful aid of the Senator, and we welcome it. His remarks will be welcomed in another quarter also, Mr. President, for I am sure, when the news reaches S Street that he has quoted with such approval on the floor of the Senate the words of Woodrow Wilson, that distinguished citizen of New Jersey will be highly elated.

The statements which the Senator from New Jersey has made with reference to those who preached the gospel of gush throughout this country, and who, to that extent, hampered the preparedness of this Nation for war, into which, as every sane man knew, it was inevitable we should go, can not apply to me. I have advocated, whether as an editor, a public speaker, or a Senator, a big Navy and an adequate Army. I have voted here for a big Navy, for an adequate Army, and for enlarged appropriations for both.

But we are not living in the days of 1917. There sits in this city to-day a conference looking to the limitation of armament, a conference seeking to wipe out the viper of the sea and the poison gas of the land, and I have heard no suggestion from that conference, or from anyone connected with it, that the defense of this country should be turned over to the dye makers of America.

I wish to say that no one can be more anxious than I to protect any industry which exists in this country. I have stated over and over again, in such debate as has taken place upon this subject and in which I have participated, that I am an all-round protectionist.

Mr. President, I believe in a protective policy, and I say frankly to the Senate that if the dictum of the Senator from New Jersey should be accepted here, if an embargo must be placed upon dyestuffs because the manufacturers of dyestuffs say they must have it, it would be proper for every knitting mill in the country, on the ground that soldiers wear socks, to come here and demand an embargo, and we would have to grant it.

Mr. President, no adequate protection has yet been tried under a tariff law for the dyestuffs industry. In 1916, when the dye people came here and asked for protection, they were readily granted by Congress the full protection which they asked, and which they said at that time was all they would ever need; but before that protective tariff had time to operate, while we were still under the embargo laid by the operations of the British grand fleet, which prevented any dyestuffs entering this country save one small submarine cargo, before that protective tariff had an opportunity to demonstrate its usefulness, we were plunged into the war and the embargo was ipso facto continued.

The embargo has continued now for seven years, and if with seven years' absolute embargo an industry can not build itself up there must be something inherently wrong with its management.

The Senator has spoken of Mr. Bryan and his lectures. I wish to say to the Senator that the lectures of Mr. Bryan are as a whispering zephyr compared to the vociferous volume of propaganda which has been carried on by those who have advocated the continuance of the embargo.

I do not know how the Senator came into possession of the book from which he has read, but I have a copy of it, which was left at my door anonymously, and when I looked in the preface I found, over the signature of the author, statements to the effect that the establishment and the carrying on of chemical industries formed the groundwork for the stability of future peace.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MOSES. I yield.

Mr. KING. Mr. Francis B. Garvan, who is at the head of the Chemical Foundation and who is most active in perpetuating the dye lobby and preventing apparently this investigation, undoubtedly distributed those books. I received one accompanied with a letter.

Mr. MOSES. From whom, may I ask?

Mr. KING. From Mr. Garvan.

Mr. MOSES. Is he the author of this book?

Mr. KING. I have no doubt the Senator received one likewise.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, did I understand the Senator to say that Mr. Garvan is opposed to an investigation?

Mr. KING. Very apparently he is opposed to it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Why does the Senator say apparently?

Mr. KING. Because of the persistent activity of Mr. Garvan and his constant charges that those who are in favor of the investigation or favoring the work which is being suggested here are enemies to this country.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is scarcely a sufficient answer, if the Senator from New Hampshire will permit me. The Senator is giving the Senate to understand or has endeavored to give the Senate to understand that Mr. Garvan is opposing this investigation. It so happens that I know Mr. Garvan rather intimately and have known him for many years, and I think I can say with a reasonable degree of assurance that he does not fear it. It is easy to rise on the floor of the Senate and make imputations against the character and the motives of people who can not be present. I think in justice to Mr. Garvan I should make this statement.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator suffer an interruption?

Mr. MOSES. Oh, yes.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator is attempting to make it appear that in some way I have used a quotation from a book which has been written in order to propagandize the dye industry. That may be so as far as the book is concerned. Personally I do not know Mr. Garvan. I have been opposed to his methods and policies. I asked Dr. Herty, for whom I sent to come to my house in order that I might get some facts regarding the manufacture of dyes, to find an article which described the gas attack at Ypres. He told me of this book which contains a quotation from Gen. French's statement, not propaganda, but a military report describing that gas attack. So important did I think it was to point out to the Senate that the result of a failure to properly protect the dye industry would bring back those same methods and leave America unprepared, that I wanted to bring out that point of the gas attack at Ypres when the whole world was surprised and astonished.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I think the Senator will bear me out in saying that I did not impugn his motives in reading from the book. The Senator adverted in the course of his remarks to his abhorrence of methods which operate in the dark with reference to propaganda or pressure upon legislative bodies for legislation, and I wished to point out that he had unconsciously been made a victim of a method of that sort.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I deny that and resent it for the simple reason that the book is not written or published by Mr. Garvan or the Chemical Foundation. It is written by an individual independent of any association.

Mr. MOSES. But circulated by Mr. Garvan to members of legislative bodies who have to pass upon this question——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator might circulate the Bible, but it would not make the recipients religious.

Mr. MOSES. In just the same manner as the Chemical Foundation at great cost circulated many thousand copies of "Creative Chemistry," 63,000 copies of a book which retails for $3 in any store. This was circulated by the Chemical Foundation or Mr. Garvan for the purpose of influencing public opinion.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I received a copy of that book, and I will say frankly it is one of the most interesting books I ever read.

Mr. MOSES. It is, indeed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There was nothing dark or devious about my receiving the copy. I was grateful to the man who brought it to my office. What is there reprehensible about that?

Mr. MOSES. Reprehensible in that the Chemical Foundation sets itself up to be an eleemosynary institution and it circulates thousands of copies of an expensive book in order to formulate public opinion and benefit the legislation which apparently it wants, because its counsel and officers have appeared before committees of the Senate and asked for the embargo.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator must go on the assumption that legislators are fools——

Mr. MOSES. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And that they have not a sense of proportion. I think it is possible for me to read that book without having my judgment corrupted.

Mr. MOSES. Yes; but the Senators are only 96. Who received the other 62,904 copies of the book? They were sent to officers of many institutions and organizations for the purpose of formulating and forcing public opinion upon the Senate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator think 64,000 copies of anything can create public sentiment in this country?

Mr. MOSES. I think 64,000 people, carefully selected, as the list was, according to the testimony brought out before the Committee on Finance—64,000 people skillfully selected, whose minds have been brought to a common point—can exert a very great influence upon legislation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then they are dupes, in the first instance, or dishonest.

Mr. MOSES. The premise was "if their minds were brought to a common point."

Mr. WADSWORTH. There are a good many assumptions underlying the conclusions of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. MOSES. Possibly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I happened to read that book from cover to cover, as I said before, and I found it exceedingly interesting.

Mr. MOSES. So did I.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I did not find myself urged, directly or indirectly, by the book to surrender any conviction which I had previously in the matter of legislation.

Mr. MOSES. I think, however, the effect of the book throughout the country was a piece of very insidious propaganda.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am almost inclined to believe that the Senator lacks confidence in his own ability to resist that kind of thing.

Mr. MOSES. I have resisted it thus far, and I think I shall be able to continue to do so until we get a vote on this resolution at any rate.

The Senator from New Jersey adverted also to a single shipment of foreign dyes which was brought into this country during the war. He named with much particularity and enumerated in detail the history of the consignees of that cargo. I assume he sought to bring out, or at any rate to establish by innuendo, an accusation of disloyalty against those consignees. I happen to have a mere casual acquaintance with one member of that firm only, and since this debate began this morning there has been put into my hands a copy of a letter written by an authority in this country before which even the Senator from New Jersey is accustomed to bow, in which the writer said:

I am fully satisfied as to their 100 per cent American citizenship.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator give us the name of the author of the letter?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask that the Senator read the entire letter. I have a statement to make in regard to that, in view of the fact that the Senator has introduced it into the debate.

Mr. MOSES. I will, indeed, read it. It is as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, November 21, 1921.

Messrs. CARDOZO & NATHAN,
128 Broadway, New York City.

DEAR SIRS: I have before me your letter of November 16.

I am writing to say that I happen to know personally concerning your clients in a way that either you or they know little about, and I am fully satisfied as to their 100 per cent American citizenship, and I am quite agreed that there is no good reason for denying their claim to the Liberty bonds seized by the Alien Property Custodian on March 19, 1919.

I know concerning the record of Lieut. Commander Pickhardt in the Navy and know that he is very highly esteemed. Because of what I know concerning the case I am to-day directing the Alien Property Custodian to make proper restitution of this property.

Very sincerely,

WARREN G. HARDING.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to state for the benefit of the Senator from New Hampshire, if he will permit me, that I have made some investigation regarding that, and that the question of returning those bonds was on an appeal to the President made by a lawyer representing a German concern, in which it was represented that those bonds should in all fairness be returned. The Alien Property Custodian has referred that matter, I am informed, to the Department of Justice. I refer the Senator from New Hampshire to the Department of Justice for some interesting information in regard to the return of those bonds.

Mr. MOSES. That does not happen to be in my possession, but if the owners of the bonds are having any difficulty in procuring their property, which has been ordered returned to them, I suggest that they might get them by communicating with the gentleman who writes this letter, whose name I do not intend for the moment to give to the Senator from New Jersey. This is a letter written to a constituent of mine, and reads as follows:

DEAR SIR: I am advised that you represent a claim for certain shares of the General Electric stock now held by the Alien Property Custodian, and that the claim has been disallowed because of certain disloyal remarks made by the claimant, who is an American citizen. It has also been suggested that you may desire my services in connection with this claim. Inquiry has been made as to whether I am in a position to handle the same, and I beg to advise that on July 1, 1921, I severed my connections with the Alien Property Custodian as special litigation counsel and I see no reason why I should not accept employment. I am willing to handle the claim purely upon a contingent basis.

If you desire my services, you will kindly advise me within the next few days, as I am leaving for a short vacation on August 10.

Very truly, yours,

_____.

If the Senator wishes to know what connection this letter may have with the discussion of the dyestuffs problem, I will add for his further information that it happens to be written upon the letterhead and from the office of the eleemosynary institution known as the Chemical Foundation, which apparently exists for general educational and charitable purposes, with a little private rake-off on the side.

I have no desire to detain the Senate long. I thought we might dispose of this matter before the customary expiration of the morning hour. The Senator from New Jersey adverted somewhat to the claims of monopoly that exist in this country on dyestuffs and said he knew nothing of the Du Ponts. May I refresh his recollection a little by recalling that in this Chamber, when this subject was under somewhat prolonged discussion some months ago, the then senior Senator from Colorado, Mr. Thomas, in the course of a very extended speech on this subject, read into the RECORD a contract entered into between the Du Ponts of America and the Levensteins of London for the purpose of dividing the dye world between them. No eastern satraps ever met to carve a province with more unction than the Du Ponts and the Levensteins met to carve up the world between themselves, the Du Ponts to take this side of the ocean, the Levensteins to take the other. When rogues fall out honest men benefit, and it so happens that the rogues in this case did fall out and litigation was instituted, as a result of which I was prompted to see how far the ramifications of what I term a monopoly in the dyestuff industry exist on this side of the ocean. I sought to bring it down to visualized form, which form will be seen upon the chart which hangs upon the wall of the Chamber just behind me.

Because of the Du Ponts' transcendent resplendency in the sky of the dyestuff world I have placed them in the center of this universe, as is proper, and have marked them with vivid red. From them, equally in red, I have sent out the radiating lines of their influence to various affiliated and subsidiary and associated, and probably subsidized, institutions which deal with the dyestuffs industry in this country. It will be seen that a line in red runs directly from the Du Ponts to the Textile Alliance, from the Du Ponts to the advisory committee of the War Trade Board, from the Du Ponts to the Chemical Warfare Service, from the Du Ponts to the Exhibit of the National Research Council, from the Du Ponts to the Synthetic Organic Chemical Manufacturers' Association, from the Du Ponts to the Chemical Foundation, from the Du Ponts to the Alien Property Custodian, from the Du Ponts to the American Dyes Institute, from the Du Ponts to the Reparation Commission, and thence to the treaty of Versailles and the League of Nations.

In a speech which I made on this subject some months ago I pointed out the personality of the liaison officer of the Du Ponts with most of these institutions, Dr. Morris R. Poucher; and as we travel along these red roads which run from the Du Ponts to each one of these affiliated, subsidiary, probably subsidized, institutions, we meet the familiar form of Dr. Poucher. Going down, Mr. President, to that one of the organizations which bears the most resounding name—the Synthetic Organic Chemical Manufacturers' Association of the United States—a newborn baby in this already crowded house of illegitimate children of an illegitimate transaction, we discern easily the familiar figure of our old friend Dr. Poucher.

If we proceed to take the longer road which leads down into the southeast corner of the map, and goes from the Du Ponts to the American Dyes Institute, again we meet our old friend Dr. Poucher coming toward us with the smile on his face with which he always greets his friends. So, Mr. President, we find him in almost every one of these roads.

This information, Mr. President, should be developed through an orderly investigation before a committee of the Senate. I say "a committee of the Senate" because this question is in the Senate now; it is before the Senate by reason of the efforts made before the Committee on Finance to write the dye embargo into our permanent tariff law. sentatives has defeated it, the question is here and nowhere else, and here, Mr. President, and nowhere else is the place to make the investigation.

I much prefer that the investigation shall go forward in an orderly manner before a committee of the Senate sitting impartially, in spite of the fears of the Senator from New Jersey, but searching deeply into every phase of this question. If, however, it must be conducted by means of speeches upon the floor of the Senate, it may be done in that way, probably to the interruption of more important and pressing business.

Mr. President, the question is here, and it should be disposed of; and no one more than I welcomes the great assistance of the Senator from New Jersey, whose amendment to this resolution is about to be adopted, and from whom we shall then receive all the constant and valuable cooperation of which he is so capable.

AMENDMENT OF TRANSPORTATION ACT OF 1920.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, a few days ago when the railroad funding bill was under consideration I submitted an amendment to that bill, a copy of which I now send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 7, after line 2, it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. 3. That paragraph (3) of section 15a of the interstate commerce act, approved February 4, 1887, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(3) The commission shall from time to time determine and make public what percentage of such aggregate property value constitutes a fair return thereon, and such percentage shall be uniform for all rate groups or territories which may be designated by the commission. In making such determination it shall give due consideration, among other things, to the transportation needs of the country and the necessity (under honest, efficient, and economical management of existing transportation facilities) of enlarging such facilities in order to provide the people of the United States with adequate transportation, and to the return upon capital invested in industrial enterprises, in order not to prejudice the interests of, impose an unreasonable burden upon, or discriminate against shippers, producers, and consumers."

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, the amendment submitted by me, if adopted, would repeal that provision of section 15a of the interstate commerce act which requires the commission to establish rates that will enable the railroads to earn a fixed income of from 5½ to 6 per cent on the aggregate value of the property, without giving consideration to the interests of the shippers or the public. The amendment proposed would remove that arbitrary limitation on the commission in fixing rates, and thus make it possible for the commission, in considering the transportation needs of the country, not only to have regard for the interests of the carriers but to pay heed to the needs of the shippers and patrons of the roads as well as to the rights of the general public.

As the law stands to-day, with this guaranty clause in effect, the Interstate Commerce Commission has no choice but to levy a toll upon all industry sufficient to pay the railroads a fixed profit, though every other industry in the land may operate at a loss. If the guaranty clause is repealed by the adoption of my amendment, the Interstate Commerce Commission in passing upon any proposed modification of the rates will be free to determine whether the charge can be made without imposing an unreasonable burden upon the shippers and consumers.

The disproportionately high freight rates which the commission has been forced to levy because of the mandatory provision of this section have constituted one of the greatest factors contributing to the desperate economic conditions in which the country now finds itself. To carry out this provision of the law, on July 29, 1920, the commission, in a decision designated as Ex parte 74, directed an increase of freight rates amounting to 40 per cent in the eastern group of roads, 25 per cent in the southern group, 35 per cent in the western group, and 25 per cent in the Mountain-Pacific group. This increase was in addition to a general increase of 25 per cent allowed during the period of Government control.

The result of this advance was nothing less than ruin to producers in many sections of the West. Under ordinary circumstances the increase would have proved in many cases inequitable and unnecessarily burdensome, but coming, as it did, coincidently with an abrupt decline in the values of every product of the farm and ranch, it was more than disastrous in its effect, not only bringing great and immediate financial loss to the producers, but in many sections suspending the very processes of production themselves. Scarcely a day goes by that the attention of the Senate is not called, in one way or another, to whole sections of the country where the farmers are unable to move their products because the prices offered are not sufficient to pay the actual freight charges involved in reaching the market. In such circumstances the farmer no longer has any incentive, with the result that farms and ranches, which are the very foundation of the Nation's prosperity, are being allowed to lie idle.

Among the many illustrations that may be cited of the manner in which these increased transportation charges levy a prohibitive tax upon production in different sections of the country I select only a few. The following extracts are from a letter received from the Milford Grange Cooperative Association, of Lander, Wyo.:

On November 4, 1921, at Powell, Wyo., wheat of the grade of No. 1 durum northern spring fancy was bringing the grower 67 cents per bushel; on the same date wheat of the same grade was quoted at $1.27 in Minneapolis. The freight rate, Powell to Minneapolis, is 68 cents per 100 pounds. A carload of wheat amounts to about 1,000 bushels. This means that it cost $600 to transport a car to market, $400 of which is freight, $200 being the buyer's commission. The freight charge is unreasonable and unjustifiable and can at least be remedied. * * *

We can not specifically state the freight-rate situation on potatoes, but when the grower gets around $1 per 100 pounds and the consumers in the Missouri River market territory pay $3.50 to $4 for the same quantity we might be excused for asking our Secretary of Commerce whether his department has any jurisdiction in such matters. We feel that we are being robbed, and we do not know just where to turn for protection or relief.

Our great industry is live stock. You are only too well acquainted with the terrible condition confronting our State in that line. Only to-day returns from a car of cattle shipped to Omaha show that it cost me $175 to ship and sell it, the freight being $138. Interstate freight rates prohibit us from shipping feed or stock from one section to another. * * *

We present to you the above as merely illustrative of our numerous troubles. Under such conditions the farmers and stockmen of Wyoming have not the means with which to properly defend themselves. We feel, to put it plainly again, that we are being robbed. * * *

As shown by the hearings on the grain and rate case before the Interstate Commerce Commission, a resident of Billings, Mont., on March 9, 1921, shipped a car of hay to Kansas City. The car sold for $173.32. The freight was $138.50, the commission $14.46, other charges $1.25, making a total charge of $154.21. Thus the net return to the consignor was $19.31 on the car, or $1.33 per ton for hay that actually cost from $10 to $15 per ton to produce and deliver to the local shipping point. It is estimated that there will be 20,000 cars less hay received in Kansas City this year than a year ago.

Nine shipments of hay from different points in Nebraska to Omaha during the first part of the present year showed the following results: The average selling price was $12.11; the average cost of harvesting was $5.61 per ton; commission, $1 per ton; freight, $4.87; making a total of expense incident to producing and marketing, $11.52. It will be seen that the average return to the producer was only 59 cents per ton.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will it disturb the Senator if I interrupt him a moment?

Mr. KENDRICK. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. I merely wish to call the Senator's attention to a shipment of cantaloupes from a place called Hope in my State to Pittsburgh. The shipment brought $586.70, but when the freight, the drayage, and the commission merchant's charges were taken out, the shipment netted the grower $38.20, or a little over 6 per cent of what the shipment sold for. Of over $10,000 worth of shipments of cantaloupes, beans, and commodities of that kind from the same locality, the average freight charges ran from 65 per cent to 94 and a fraction per cent.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I am obliged to the Senator for his illustration. I wish to say here that I have received from friends in the live-stock industry many reports of still more serious burdens placed upon shipments of stock which are not included in the statement from which I have quoted. Among those that appear to me to be the most convincing was a shipment of 300 head of what are known as canner cows that were sent to the Fort Worth market. This class of stock, of course, sells for the lowest price, and there was a long freight haul en route to market, but the cost of transportation and of marketing consumed such a great proportion of the gross return that the cattle actually netted to the owner 18 cents a head, making for the total of 300 head $54.

Mr. CARAWAY. Were they full-grown cows?

Mr. KENDRICK. They were full-grown cows.

According to evidence submitted at the agricultural inquiry, the average price of 15 commodities in August, 1920, at a time when prices had started to decline, was 95 per cent above the average five-year prewar level, while freight rates were only 30 per cent above that level. During the year that followed this relationship was completely reversed and, on August 1, 1921, the average price level on these 15 farm commodities was only 30 per cent above the five-year prewar level, while freight rates were 90 per cent above that level. Thus, with the market price of farm products tumbling at an unprecedented and precipitous speed, the producer was called upon to pay a transportation charge three times greater than that which he had paid during the war. It was as though the producer had been called upon to pay a tax upon his losses. We have not hesitated to repeal the tax on excess profits because we have been told that its effect was to hamper industry, destroy initiative, and induce stagnation. We have reduced surtaxes because we have been told that they drive investment funds out of productive industry into tax-exempt securities. Having acted so promptly for big business and for wealth, is it possible that we shall deny to the farmers and ranchers of the country even the slight measure of relief that would be afforded by the repeal of the guaranty clause which, in effect, is a tax upon excess losses?

Figures submitted in evidence at the hearings on the grain and rate case before the Interstate Commerce Commission in August show that the price of corn on the basis of Chicago market quotations was, during that month, only 9 per cent above the 1913 level, while freight rates were 84 per cent higher; barley 13 per cent higher, while freight rates were 80 per cent higher; oats 1 per cent higher, freight 80 per cent higher; wheat 49 per cent higher, freight 66 per cent higher.

To-day it costs $831 to ship a carload of wool from Boise, Idaho, to Boston. The same shipment cost the flockmaster only $475 in 1917. It is cheaper for the Idaho wool producer to ship to Portland, Oreg., and there rebill for Boston in order to get the advantage of the low transcontinental rate which prevails from Pacific to Atlantic ports in order to meet water competition. It is estimated that 30,000,000 pounds of western wool will either be rebilled by this method, thus entailing hundreds of miles of extra and unnecessary transportation, or that the shipments will be sent to Pacific ports by rail and then to Boston by water via the Panama Canal. It does not require argument to prove that a law which compels flockmasters living in the Rocky Mountains, in a State that borders on Canada, to use the Panama Canal to ship their product to Boston, is uneconomic if not absurd.

The rate on wool in maximum car lots of 32,000 pounds from Cheyenne, Wyo., to Boston is $2.06 per hundred. In minimum car lots of 24,000 pounds it is $2.35 per hundred. The water rate from the Pacific coast ports to Atlantic ports is 90 cents per hundredweight. The rate from Australia to Atlantic ports is $1.62 per hundred. Senators will not be slow to note the significance of these figures. The wool producer of the Antipodes can place his shipment in Boston more cheaply than the American woolgrower can transport his clip halfway across his own country by what we have been taught to believe is the most efficient transportation system in the world. To state it plainly, the guaranty clause is, in effect, a protective tariff, not for American but for foreign woolgrowers—and this at a time when the American producer is enduring the most severe hardships he has encountered in a generation, when our every thought should be to lighten, not to increase, the burden he is forced to carry.

To illustrate the extent of the disaster that has befallen our Western flockmasters, I desire to quote from the testimony of Dr. S. W. McClure, of Nampa, Idaho, who appeared before the Interstate Commerce Commission during the hearings on the petition of the live-stock producers of the West for a reduction of rates. Dr. McClure, who is a producer, as well as a representative of a loan company, in describing his own situation said:

> In 1918 I sold my wool for 60 cents a pound. In 1919 I consigned it, as was my custom, to a cooperative wool warehouse and storage company. I received an advance of 35 cents a pound on the wool. I, of course, had to pay the freight and handling expenses, so that the charges against that wool, and it is not sold yet, approach 45 cents a pound. I am willing at this time to give the warehouse holding my 1919 wool that clip and my 1920 wool and 1921 wool to make up what I now owe on that one year's clip.

In other words, the losses incurred on the product for the year 1919 were so great that to discharge his debt the producer must surrender not only the product of that year but the product of the two succeeding years as well. Under such circumstances, what defense can be made of a law which compels that man to increase his losses in order to guarantee the profits of the railroads?

Let me here call your attention to a statement of the returns from a shipment of choice lambs shipped from Caldwell, Idaho, to Chicago. There were 757 lambs in the shipment. I do not have the selling price, but the gross return was $6,696.30. The freight on the shipment amounted to $1,467.67, or $1.66 per head. Feed in transit amounted to $158.40, or 18 cents per head. Feed at Sycamore, Ill., amounted to $1,590.03, or $1.80 per head. Miscellaneous expenses amounted to $93.97. After the expenses were paid, the shipper had a net return of only $3,247.93. More than one-half of the selling price had gone into the payment of fixed charges, over which he had no control.

The illustration which I have just given relates to a shipment of lambs, which always bring a much better price than any other class of sheep. Flockmasters of the West have been unable to market old ewes at prices that would pay the charges of getting them to market; and in many instances, I am told, they are being permitted to die on the range.

Based on quotations in the Market Reporter of November 5, the average price paid on November 1 for common steers in Omaha was $5 per hundred. At this price the gross return on an 1,100-pound steer would have been $55. The freight rate from Cheyenne, Wyo., to Omaha is 50 cents per hundred, making the freight on this animal $5.50, or exactly 10 per cent of the gross. Canner cows and heifers averaged $3.35 per hundred. The gross return on a 700-pound animal would have been $22.75. The freight at 50 cents per hundred would amount to $3.50 on this animal, or 15.3 per cent of the gross. The low price quoted on canner cows and heifers at that market on that date was $2.75, which would have given a gross return on a 700-pound animal of $18.75. The freight at $3.50 would equal 18.9 per cent of the gross.

Here I am reminded to point out that as the value of the net return on the product decreases the proportionate cost of marketing increases. As an illustration, let us assume that on an animal which brings $30 on the market the freight is $5, or 16⅔ per cent of the gross return. If the same animal sold on a higher market for $60, the freight would remain the same, or practically the same, and amount to 8⅓ per cent of the gross; all of which illustrates that as the value declines the proportionate cost of fixed charges is increased. This indicates clearly the ruinous effect upon industry of increasing freight rates when the values of the products transported were declining to the lowest levels known for years.

Having indicated the disastrous effect upon the agricultural and live-stock interests of the country, it may now be shown conclusively that the increase of freight rates provided under the arbitrary provisions of section 15a have actually proved detrimental instead of beneficial to the railroads themselves. This increase in freight rates has operated to defeat the very purpose it was intended to serve. Instead of increasing revenue for the carriers, it has decreased the returns by limiting the volume of traffic. The volume of tonnage of freight in nearly every commodity carried by the railroads accurately reflects the condition of the live-stock and agricultural producers, for, as prosperity departs from the producer, he ceases to be a purchaser of the materials which the railroads carry. This is rather clearly shown in a detailed report of freight commodity statistics of class I roads, prepared by the Bureau of Statistics of the Interstate Commerce Commission, an abstract of which I submit for the RECORD without reading:

WESTERN DISTRICT.

Comparative statement of freight commodity statistics of Class I roads of the western district for the first six months of 1920 and the first six months of 1921, compiled from the quarterly statements of the Bureau of Statistics of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Commodity.	Total revenue freight carried, 1920.		Total revenue freight carried, 1921.
	Number of carloads.	Number of tons (2,000 pounds).	Number of carloads.	Number of tons (2,000 pounds).
Products of agriculture	1,983,101	48,615,231	1,838,909	48,919,739
Animals and products	951,108	11,246,513	815,089	9,415,524
Products of mines	2,791,382	124,266,814	1,677,003	74,629,937
Products of forests	1,596,051	47,546,889	1,134,767	33,699,053
Manufactures and miscellaneous	2,627,569	64,689,274	1,772,563	45,428,356
Total	9,889,211	296,364,721	7,237,331	212,092,609

This table shows that the number of cars of manufacturers' products and miscellaneous products, including merchandise of all kinds, was 855,006 less during the first six months of 1921 than during the same period in 1920. It will also be noted that there were 6,644,005 cars less freight moved during the first six months of 1921 than during the first six months of the previous year. In that fertile region west of the Mississippi, which produces practically all the surplus food products of the Nation, the decline in the volume of freight was more than 2,500,000 cars in a single year. Agricultural products in that district fell off 154,192 cars, and live stock and live-stock products decreased 136,029 cars. The revenue in that district for the first half of 1921 was $1,022,807,701, as compared with $1,105,032,814 for the same period of 1920, a decrease of $82,225,113.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. KENDRICK. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Was there a falling off in production, or was the falling off in the amount of business all occasioned by the high freight rates?

Mr. KENDRICK. Undoubtedly the production of farm products was equal to that of the previous year; but, as I shall attempt to show, very many of the producers were unable to ship their products because the freight rates consumed the entire receipts for the products when they reached the market, a situation which made marketing prohibitive.

The statistics of the commission show that in the movement of hay alone from this western district there was a decrease of nearly 50,000 cars in the number shipped during the same period last year.

It will be seen from this table that every group of commodities shows a decreased movement. These figures tell a very convincing story of the restrictive influence that the unwarranted increase of freight rates has had on the orderly distribution of the products of the farm and factory. In order to appreciate that the cost of transportation has fallen with blighting force upon the productive capacity of the West, one needs only to see the thousands of tons of hay rotting in the stacks throughout that region because it can not be moved to market on account of the high toll taken by the railroads, and to listen to the many stories that are related by stockmen of exactions for freight and other fixed charges, which not infrequently during the past few months have absorbed as much, in any event, as 25 per cent of the gross returns which they received for their product at the market, and in not a few cases actually consumed the entire proceeds.

These are startling statements, but they are fully substantiated by a mass of evidence. The hearings before the Joint Commission on Agricultural Inquiry, or the record of the hearings of the Interstate Commerce Commission on the petitions for reduction in freight rates on live stock, contain the most conclusive evidence.

As indicating in a most convincing way that the rate increase authorized by Ex parte 74 can not be justified on the grounds of necessity so far as the western transcontinental lines are concerned, I submit for the RECORD a table prepared by the Interstate Commerce Commission, showing not the earnings of these lines, but the dividends declared by them. The lowest of these dividends on preferred stock was 4 per cent, the highest 5 per cent; the lowest dividend on common stock was 6 per cent, the highest 10 per cent.

Statement showing rate of dividends declared by the roads named, years ended June 30, 1915, to Dec. 31, 1920.

Year ended—	Southern Pacific Co.	Union Pacific R. R. Co.	Chicago, Burlington & Quincy R. R. Co.	Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Ry. Co.	Great Northern Ry. Co.	Northern Pacific R. R. Co.
June 30, 1915	6 per cent common	4 per cent preferred 8 per cent common	8 per cent common	5 per cent preferred 6 per cent common	7 per cent preferred	7 per cent common.
June 30, 1916	do	4 per cent preferred 8 per cent common	do	5 per cent preferred 6 per cent common	do	Do.
Dec. 31, 1916	do	4 per cent preferred 10 per cent common	do	5 per cent preferred 6 per cent common	do	Do.
Dec. 31, 1917	do	4 per cent preferred 10 per cent common	18 per cent common	5 per cent preferred 7½ per cent common	do	Do.
Dec. 31, 1918	do	4 per cent preferred 10 per cent common	8 per cent common	5 per cent preferred 6 per cent common	do	Do.

Dec. 31, 1920	do	4 per cent preferred 10 per cent common	do	5 per cent preferred 6 per cent common	do	Do.

The foregoing list of railroads includes practically every one of the great transcontinental lines acting as carriers for the vast empire of country lying west of the Missouri River. The dividends declared, as shown by this table, indicate clearly that no advance of rates could have been based on the needs of these roads. In addition to this table, I may quote the following news despatch:

CHICAGO, December 1.

Directors of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Co. to-day declared a semiannual dividend of 5 per cent and a special cash dividend of 15 per cent, payable December 31, to stockholders of record December 17. The directors also announced inauguration of a pension plan January 1. Directors of the Colorado & Southern subsidiary committee declared a 2 per cent dividend on the first preferred, completed payment on the regular 4 per cent annually; a dividend of 4 per cent on the second preferred, and a dividend of 3 per cent on the common stock, all to be paid out of surplus earnings.

I submit, without reading, a statement for the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Barrons Financial Review.]

BURLINGTON—BENEFIT TO NORTHERN PACIFIC AND GREAT NORTHERN FROM EXTRA DIVIDEND.

As Northern Pacific and Great Northern each own $82,933,700 of Burlington stock, its extra dividend just declared will mean additional income to each of the controlling roads of $12,440,000, equivalent to 5 per cent on Northern Pacific's $248,000,000 stock and 4.97 per cent on Great Northern's $250,000,000 stock.

Total dividends declared by Burlington this year have been 2 per cent on $110,939,100 stock and 25 per cent on $170,839,100 stock, aggregating $44,926,500.

Dividends accruing to Northern roads have been 2 per cent on $107,613,500 and 25 per cent on $165,867,400, aggregating $43,619,000.

This year's interest on joint bonds secured by Burlington stock and all the $230,000,000 6s remained outstanding to the end of the year would have been $11,775,000, which, deducted from aggregate dividends on pledged stock, would have left surplus of $31,844,000.

Great Northern's share of the interest has been increased somewhat by conversion of half of the 6s into Great Northern 7s, while Northern Pacific's share has been decreased slightly by conversion of about $10,000,000 6s into Northern Pacific 6s. But Great Northern's portion of the interest will not exceed $6,000,000, while Northern Pacific's will be, roughly, $5,800,000.

Mr. KENDRICK. Having in mind the hardship imposed upon the shippers of the West by the 35 per cent increase in rates, one finds it difficult to employ moderate language in passing judgment upon the guaranty clause, particularly when it is realized, as the dividends above indicated prove, that the railroads did not need the increase. The records show that almost every one of these six lines referred to was earning more than the guaranteed rate of income. But it was found necessary under the provisions of the interstate commerce act to levy this increase of freight rates even under a trying condition, not for the purpose, as stated before, of giving necessary revenue to the railroads involved, nor for the purpose of providing transportation service for that section of the country, but for the purpose of taking care of the transportation needs of remote sections, which, in all probability, are more favorably situated as to markets.

The interstate commerce act was originally enacted to protect the public from the extortions of the railroads, and made this principle one of primary consideration. That provision of the act to-day remains unchanged and reads as follows:

All charges made for any service rendered or to be rendered in the transportation of passengers or property, or in the transmission of intelligence by wire or wireless as aforesaid, or in connection therewith, shall be just and reasonable, and every unjust and unreasonable charge for such service or any part thereof is prohibited and declared to be unlawful.

In the operation of the present law it is impossible to believe that discrimination could be more radical. It certainly could not be more disastrous in its effect. The result is shown, particularly in the West, by the abandoned farms and the diminishing herds and flocks. With corn selling for fuel and the value of live stock in many cases absorbed in the cost of marketing, a shortage of products threatens the Nation. With the decline of the agricultural industry, which is basic throughout the West, will follow a corresponding decline in other business and industries. The very prosperity of the railroads themselves is in-separably linked with the prosperity of the farmers and live-stock producers of the West.

I want to call attention to a statement made to me to-day by a man well authorized to speak, in effect that in the Fort Worth market, one of the great live-stock markets of the Southwest, there have been slaughtered up to this time, during 1921, 150,000 more calves than were slaughtered in the same period last year.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, my information is that there has been a reduction of 10 per cent in rates on agricultural products. Has that gone into effect in the West, and if so, with what consequences? Has not that been of some benefit?

Mr. KENDRICK. It is my understanding that such a reduction has been ordered, but has not gone into effect. I expect to try to show before I am through with this statement that such a reduction would prove entirely ineffective, and I take occasion to say here that there will be no adequate relief to our western country until the rate increase authorized by Ex parte 74 is entirely canceled or eliminated. In our country west of the Missouri River that amounted to 35 per cent.

There was a reduction of 20 per cent in the rates on live stock where existing rates were in excess of 50 cents per hundred. But this rate did not become effective until September 20, which was not until after the greater part of the fall shipments had already moved to market. The reduction did not apply where the rates were already below 50 cents per hundred, and therefore gave no relief to many of the shippers. It might also be stated that the reduction was only temporary and intended to be suspended after January 1.

Under such impossible conditions it is no wonder that in some sections of the West many farms and ranches are going under the hammer at mortgage or tax sale. Only a few days ago, in turning the pages of a newspaper published in one of the most prosperous sections of the extreme West, under ordinary conditions, I noted three solid pages of notices advertising farms and ranches to be sold for taxes.

It is contended by many of the friends of the legislation that the law did not arbitrarily guarantee fixed incomes for railroad properties. Without regard to the language of the law, the interpretation of the law made the guaranty clause mandatory. I quote from the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission in passing upon Ex parte 74, as follows:

> In establishing rates for the two-year period we have no discretion as to the amount of the fair return except that we add to the 5½ per cent provided by law a sum not exceeding one-half of 1 per cent of such aggregate value to make provision in whole or in part for improvements, betterments, or equipment, which, according to the accounting system prescribed by the commission, are chargeable to capital account. Having determined the per cent we are called upon to perform the administrative task of establishing rates that will yield in the aggregate as nearly as may be that per cent until March 1, 1922.

To guarantee incomes to the railroads and not to the producers is to assume that transportation is more essential than production. The very existence of the roads themselves is dependent upon an uninterrupted flow of commodities from the point of production to centers of distribution and consumption. Those responsible for the administration of the roads should realize that the welfare of the communities served by such roads is inseparably linked with the welfare of the carriers themselves. There is an interdependence of the one upon the other that can not be disregarded without serious consequence to both. As transportation facilities are vital in their importance to industries, so also is the welfare of every farmer along the track of the greatest importance to the railroads. For railroads to continue to prosper the communities they serve must prosper.

I am not unmindful of the difficulties of the railroads, but I want to urge most emphatically that while the Government is dealing generously with the transportation lines, as it most certainly has in the past, it should at least deal justly with the shippers.

No principle of economics or morals can be found to justify what is commonly termed the guaranty clause of 15a. Any arbitrary or preferential right accorded any industry under such a plan must by the very nature of things be made at the expense of other industries. As stated before, the interstate commerce act as originally enacted was to protect the public from extortions of railroads, and made this provision one of primary importance in that all rates should be "reasonable." Since the law was amended the commission has been required to ignore and disregard entirely the rights of the shipper. The principal objection is not that the guaranteed rate of profit is unreasonable in itself, but that it is unreasonable in the extreme to single out one industry and by law protect it from loss at a time when every other industry is suffering the effects of economic readjustment and many industries are fighting for their very existence.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I understand the Senator to say that this interest probably under certain conditions would not be excessive. As pertinent to that question, I would like to know what they were earning prior to the enactment of this guaranty law.

Mr. KENDRICK. I do not have at hand this information, but I have attempted to show by tables submitted, probably during the Senator's absence, some of the dividends paid on both common and preferred stock, particularly as applied to railroads west of the Missouri River.

Mr. TRAMMELL. According to my understanding, they earned, on the aggregate value of the entire properties in the United States, 2¾ per cent. That was about the average prior to the enactment of this law. That being true, when you raise it to 5½ per cent you are practically doubling your transportation charges.

Mr. KENDRICK. I think that is quite correct, and the 35 per cent in the western section referred to is just that much greater burden added to high rates already in existence at the time this increase was made.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. KENDRICK. With pleasure.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Is the Senator in position to tell us what the prospect is for the repeal of this guaranty clause?

Mr. KENDRICK. I will say to the Senator that I have no information on that point. I think it is easily within the bounds of discretion to say that there is a strong sentiment in the Senate in favor of such repeal.

It is true that 5 or 6 per cent can not be called a high rate of income, if based on a fair valuation. Occasions must arise, under favorable conditions, when in every section of the country railroads should be allowed to earn much more than that percentage, while, under conditions such as now prevail, transportation systems, like the industries and individuals they serve, might well be content to earn only the overhead expenses until such time as general conditions improve.

The opponents of the amendment may argue that this guaranty provision will expire by limitation in March, 1922, but an answer to this is found in the statement that such provision of law should never have been enacted in the first place, and the sooner it is repealed the more promptly will its vicious influences be terminated. An injustice of the kind this law inflicts upon the country should not be tolerated for a moment longer than it would take to repeal it.

The case, then, against the guaranty clause is clear. It is fundamentally unsound and uneconomic, because a law which lays a tax upon all industry for the benefit of one is indefensible from any point of view. It was argued when this provision was inserted in the transportation act that the Government should assure the railroads a fixed minimum income in consideration of the powers of regulation and control over the roads which were vested in the commission. It was impossible then and it is impossible now to foresee what circumstances the future may develop, and it was a fallacy to assume that by writing a flat profit guaranty into the law injustice could be prevented. The results, as proven by the conditions and the statistics I have just laid before you, prove that it has had an effect quite the reverse from what was anticipated. It forced an unjustified and unwarranted increase of freight rates for the benefit of the railroads that needed no increase at a time when the shipper, with the values of his products falling off and his returns being reduced, was in need of assistance. The net result was only to make more certain and more rapid the economic collapse of the country.

To fix incomes is to destroy initiative, to decrease efficiency, and to lessen the need of economy. A limited income is in every sense of the word as deadly in its effect upon the railroads. It takes away from the industry the pride of administration of both officials and employees. It removes that most vital factor, the spirit of enterprise. It is unsound in principle because of its effect upon both the roads themselves and those who are served by the systems, and such a plan entirely nullifies the principle for which the interstate commerce act was passed.

Not in a generation has the West been in a more critical position than it is to-day, and I have no hesitation in saying that the high freight rates caused by this guaranty clause contribute the factor which more than any other one thing is preventing readjustment. There can be no "return to normalcy" while industry as a whole is laboring under this unjustifiable tax.

Repeal this clause, reduce freight rates to normal, and I venture the prediction that recovery will be hastened. The producer's credit will be improved, he will be enabled to ship his product, he will be enabled to buy other commodities, freight business will increase, and the railroads as well as the producer and the public at large will feel the impulse of improved conditions.

MICHIGAN SENATORIAL ELECTION.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I observe by the RECORD that during my absence from the Chamber on yesterday a colloquy took place between the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], who had the floor, and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] touching some phases of the so-called Newberry case, in which the Senator from Georgia said:

I know that the Senator from Mississippi desires to be entirely fair, but his statement in reference to the Newberry case is, to say the least, not full. Mr. Newberry was indicted in Michigan for conspiracy to violate a law which the Supreme Court of the United States said was unconstitutional. The Supreme Court said that there was no evidence whatever of corruption on the part of Mr. Newberry, and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] admitted on the floor of the Senate that there was no bribery.

The statement is not correct so far as the admission is attributed to me nor, in my judgment, is it correct in the statement of what the Supreme Court decided in the Newberry case. The Senator from Georgia must have referred to a colloquy between himself and myself in the course of some remarks submitted by me to the Senate on the 19th of November, recorded at page 8843 of the RECORD. I was at the time presenting the argument that large sums of money had been spent by the so-called Newberry committee in the employment of paid workers, and I was reading from the record to show such employment and such payment. In the course of the testimony which I read it appeared that one of the paid workers had passed some money in a clandestine way to another man whose services he was endeavoring to secure as a further worker in the interest of Mr. Newberry. The point I was making was not that any voters had been bribed or that anybody had been bribed. I was endeavoring to establish the character of the services being performed by these paid workers. In that connection I was interrupted by the Senator from Georgia, who said:

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. If the Senator is referring to my statement, he misunderstood me. I have here the decision of Chief Justice White, which is not a dissenting opinion, and Chief Justice White exonerates Mr. Newberry entirely, and the judge who tried him excluded from the jury any accusation of bribery.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I gladly yield to the Senator to read to the Senate the language of Chief Justice White exonerating Mr. Newberry.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I will do that with pleasure.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Was the Senator in the Chamber when I discussed the effect of the decision of the Supreme Court?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I may not have been in at the time. Does the Senator still want me to read the language to which I referred?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator please. I do not want to pass that question at all.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Here is what the court said, on page 18:

"At the trial, before the submission of the case to the jury, the court put the fifth count entirely out of the case by instructing the jury to disregard it, as there was no evidence whatever to sustain it. The bribery, therefore, disappeared."

That is what Chief Justice White said:

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have not discussed the bribery of voters at all. There was a count that voters had been bribed, and there was no testimony to sustain it, so the Chief Justice said that it was properly dismissed. I have not talked about the bribery of voters at all.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Then I misunderstood the Senator, especially regarding the magazine and the $50—those two incidents.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not contend that they were bribed to vote. I contended that that was to hire them to go out and use their influence, and, at the same time, to get their support of Mr. Newberry. I am not arguing that Mr. Newberry ought to be unseated because any voters were bribed. I am arguing that Mr. Newberry ought to be unseated, first, because the committee who were his agents spent more than $3,750; second, I am arguing that he ought to be unseated because the committee, his agents, grossly and flagrantly violated the statute of the State of Michigan; in other words, hired those men to go to work for Newberry.

It is upon this statement that the Senator from Georgia must have advised the Senate that the Senator from Montana admitted that there was no bribery. It seems perfectly plain that I was contending at the time not that voters were bribed but that money had been illegally spent to hire workers to go out and exert their influence in behalf of Mr. Newberry, and in that connection their activities evidenced some disposition to bribe voters, but I was not called upon to admit that voters were or were not bribed. I was not discussing that subject at all.

The same may be said with reference to a statement to the effect that the Supreme Court had decided that there was no corruption. The Supreme Court decided nothing of the kind. There was, as stated here, a count in the indictment that there was a conspiracy to bribe voters, and no evidence upon that count was submitted at all and it went by the board. But corruption in elections is a term which extends far beyond the mere matter of the bribery of voters.

Corruption, as the term is ordinarily used, may be applied very properly to the subsidizing of newspapers and the acquisition of newspaper influence. It is very properly used in connection with the employment of a man to go to work for a candidate, whose support and influence is secured through the expenditure of money, even though he does not agree for the money to vote. Corruption may exist in many ways other than the corruption of voters.

The Supreme Court did not undertake to determine the question of whether voters had been bribed or had not. No evidence was submitted upon that subject before the trial court, and the Supreme Court merely recited the fact that no evidence had been submitted. The count, therefore, was properly dismissed and was not before the Supreme Court in any way, shape, or manner, and the Supreme Court did not undertake to pass upon the question as to whether there was bribery in the election or otherwise.

INVESTIGATION OF LOBBYING ACTIVITIES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 77, proposing to create a special committee to investigate the expenditures made in behalf of various propaganda and in the maintenance of lobbies in Washington.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey tendered an amendment this morning. So far as I am able, I accept the amendment. I ask that it be reported and the Senate permitted to vote on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 3, line 18, after the word "monopoly," insert a semicolon and the following:

To investigate the activities and methods of importers of dyes from Germany, and their agents, attorneys, and lobbyists to influence Congress in behalf of special legislation; and to investigate the dye and chemical industries of the United States, and the supply and distribution methods, within the United States and elsewhere, of the German and chemical industries, with a view to recommending proper legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is accepted by the Senator from Utah. The Secretary will read the amendment reported by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The READING CLERK. On page 4, strike out the last paragraph in the following words:

Resolved further, That the committee is authorized to subpœna witnesses, send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ the necessary clerical assistance in the prosecution of such investigation.

Mr. KING. I ask that the Senate disagree to that amendment, and I call for a vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, as I understand, this investigation is to be made by the Judiciary Committee or some subcommittee of that committee?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Has not the committee general authority without reference to the paragraph which the Senator desires to have rejected?

Mr. KING. I wish to "make assurance doubly sure." If they have that authority, then there is nothing improper in rejecting the amendment. The provision was reported by the Judiciary Committee itself, by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Judiciary Committee did not recommend that this provision be stricken out?

Mr. KING. They were in favor of the provision and reported it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is recommended to be stricken out by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, the RECORD will show whether the committee has that authority or not. I have not any doubt that it has, and I do not see any use in duplicating it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think the committee has full authority to summon witnesses.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the resolution as modified.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I thought the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] had offered an amendment to the resolution.

Mr. KING. That has been accepted.

Mr. NORRIS. That amendment has been agreed to.

Mr. KING. It has been agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. But has it been agreed to by vote?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not been agreed to by vote, but by acceptance.

Mr. KING. Then, let us take a vote on it if the Senator desires.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not understand that the acceptance of an amendment by the author of a resolution is an adoption of the amendment, but that the question must be put. I simply asked if the Chair had proceeded in that way.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the understanding of the Chair that a Senator submitting a resolution has a right to modify it up to the time that the yeas and nays are ordered.

Mr. KING. I suggest that a vote be taken, in any event, so as to avoid any question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey to the resolution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate adjourns to-day it stand adjourned until Monday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MICHIGAN SENATORIAL ELECTION.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that at the next session of the Senate, which I understand will be on Monday next, at the conclusion of the morning business, I shall ask recognition for the purpose of submitting a few observations upon Senate resolution 172 relating to the Newberry case.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, from the Committee on Appropriations I report back with amendments the bill (H. R. 9237) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and subsequent fiscal years, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 341) thereon. On Monday morning, at the close of the routine morning business, I shall ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE HENRY D. FLOOD.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. HENRY D. FLOOD, late a Representative from the State of Virginia, and transmitted the resolutions of the House thereon.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the resolutions from the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the resolutions of the House of Representatives, which were read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
December 8, 1921.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. HENRY D. FLOOD, a Representative from the State of Virginia.

Resolved, That a committee of 18 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect this House do now adjourn.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I move the adoption of the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolutions.

The resolutions (S. Res. 186) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. HENRY DELAWARE FLOOD, late a Representative in Congress from the State of Virginia.

Resolved, That a committee of eight Senators be appointed by the Vice President to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed under the second resolution, Mr. SWANSON, Mr. GLASS, Mr. HARRISON, Mr. CARAWAY, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. CURTIS, Mr. MCKINLEY, and Mr. WILLIS as the committee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. SWANSON. As a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned, the adjournment being, under the order previously made, to Monday, December 12, 1921, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 8, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, Thou art still leading us from day to day, and we bless Thee for all Thy gracious ministries. Reveal unto us the treasures of Thy wisdom and enrich us in all needful knowledge. Give us fortitude in danger, strength in temptation, and courage in conflict. O lead us on and on to the things that can not be measured, to the peace that is beyond understanding, to the love that can not be uttered, and to the joy that can not be expressed. We pause in our bereavement and bow our heads in the presence of death. Gracious Lord, remember the stricken fireside and comfort the afflicted. Impress us with human frailty, and when we fall bear us through the darkness up the stairway. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE FLOOD, OF VIRGINIA.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, it is my painful duty to announce to the House the death of my personal friend, our beloved colleague, Hon. HENRY D. FLOOD, from the tenth district of Virginia. He died at his residence in this city this forenoon at 20 minutes past 11 o'clock.

At some future time I shall ask the House to set aside a day for memorial exercises in connection with his life and public service. At present I ask permission to offer the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 241.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. HENRY D. FLOOD, a Representative from the State of Virginia.

Resolved, That a committee of 18 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect, this House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, December 9, 1921, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

400. A letter from the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, transmitting the thirty-fifth annual report of the commission; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

401. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting report of the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service for the fiscal year 1921; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

402. A letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting report giving aggregate number of publications issued by the Department of Agriculture during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921, together with the cost of preparation, paper, and printing of each publication, and the number of each distributed; to the Committee on Printing.

403. A letter from the Acting Director of the United States Botanic Garden, transmitting information relative to travel from Washington, D. C., in connection with official business during the fiscal year 1921; to the Committee on the Library.

404. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting annual report of the American National Red Cross for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

405. A letter from the Attorney General, transmitting annual report of the Attorney General of the United States for the fiscal year 1921; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

406. A letter from the United States Civil Service Commission, transmitting statement showing expenses for travel of officers and employees of the Civil Service Commission from Washington to points outside the District of Columbia during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921; to the Committee on Appropriations.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9193) granting a pension to Eliza Davis, and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII,

Mr. FORDNEY introduced a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 34) providing for the printing of additional copies of the revenue law of 1921, which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BARBOUR: A bill (H. R. 9396) for the relief of Ernest W. Bailey; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois: A bill (H. R. 9397) granting a pension to Addie M. Elliott; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HAYDEN: A bill (H. R. 9398) granting an increase of pension to George L. Hollis; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SCOTT of Michigan: A bill (H. R. 9399) to provide for a survey of the harbor at Escanaba, Mich., with a view to its improvement for navigation; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

3232. By the SPEAKER (by request): Petition of J. D. Ryan and other citizens of the United States and voters in the Parish of Orleans, State of Louisiana, urging the enactment into law of the Towner-Sterling bills (H. R. 7 and S. 1252); to the Committee on Education.

3233. Also (by request), letter from I. Amter, secretary to the Unemployment Council of New York, transmitting the program of the council and a resolution adopted by the unemployment conference; to the Committee on Labor.

3234. By Mr. BACHARACH: Petition of sundry citizens of Burlington and Atlantic Counties, N. J., in favor of recognition of the Irish republic by the United States; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

3235. By Mr. KISSEL: Petition of M. Crowe and John Kelly, both of Brooklyn, N. Y., urging the recognition of the Irish republic; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

3236. By Mr. WOOD of Indiana: Resolution adopted by the East Side Men's Club, of Gary, Ind., in favor of Senate resolution 173, which provides for a treaty of peace between Great Britain and Ireland; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, December 9, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our blessed heavenly Father, we own Thy providence and we would pray: Guide us, O Thou great Jehovah, and always help us to seek the right things in the right way. In our ranks there is a vacant place. Again the mortal ties of affection and esteem are broken and laid low in the dust of earth. We listen, but we hear no sound of his approach; we look, but there is no hint that he is with us. Dear Lord, the alarm has sounded and he has left us, but there remains grateful memory of a public service without complaint, of a soul that was poured out without stint at our country's altar, and of a private life whose precept and example were above the fear of time and the fear of death. O how swift the tide that hurries us on! Give us to feel the solemn weight of things eternal. Whisper heaven's comfort and heaven's peace and heaven's hope into all sad and mourning breasts. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE TO ATTEND THE FUNERAL OF THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE FLOOD.

The SPEAKER. In accordance with the resolution adopted yesterday, the Chair appoints the following committee to attend the funeral of Mr. FLOOD:

Mr. SLEMP, Mr. MONTAGUE, Mr. HARRISON, Mr. BLAND of Virginia, Mr. WOODS of Virginia, Mr. MOORE of Virginia, Mr. DREWRY, Mr. DEAL, Mr. HOOKER, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Mr. OLDFIELD, Mr. BOWERS, Mr. PORTER, Mr. ROGERS, Mr. TEMPLE, Mr. LINTHICUM, Mr. STEDMAN, and Mr. COCKRAN.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit a unanimous-consent request. Day before yesterday the representatives of the National Farmers' Union presented to the President resolutions adopted at their national convention congratulating him upon his convening of the Disarmament Conference. I wish to extend my remarks by printing in the RECORD the short address of the secretary of that organization in presenting the resolutions to the President.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the address referred to:

ADDRESS OF A. C. DAVIS, SECRETARY OF THE NATIONAL FARMERS' UNION, PRESENTING RESOLUTIONS UPON DISARMAMENT TO PRESIDENT HARDING, DECEMBER 7, 1921.

Mr. President, upon several occasions during the past few years it has been my pleasure to present to our Chief Executive the position of organized farmers upon questions of vital concern to agriculture. The results of some of those conferences have been far-reaching in the extreme, yet none of them have afforded quite the degree of happiness that comes to us assembled here to-day. We are not necessarily representing any particular group of farmers upon this occasion, but are speaking for more than 40,000,000 of the sturdy yeomanry of America. These representatives have assembled in the Nation's Capital from all sections with a single thought in mind, to convey to you, in some degree at least, their appreciation of your magnificent effort to limit armaments among the nations.

It is extremely gratifying to us that we can for a time lay aside the class problems of the hour, and come, not in suppliance for remedial legislation, with no grievances for which we are seeking redress, but rather upon a mission of felicitation and good cheer.

Wars are older than history. Behind the misty veil of antiquity man settled his personal disputes and tribal enmity with the crude implements of his clan. Mars of Grecian mythology has always been a menace to the lives of peoples and of nations. Millions of the race and the untold wealth of empires have been sacrificed at the shrine of this ruthless god, and the chief financial burden of all time has been to pay for actual or anticipated war.

There may have been excuse for men of the stone age to use physical force for the preservation of their species, but none can defend such practices in the light of twentieth century civilization. Man prides himself upon achievement in mastering the elements, upon advancing by his constructive ability to a high degree of efficiency the arts and crafts in modern life. He has eliminated many things that have stood in the path of the march of progress, but has continued to allow the most serious menace of all to loom large, as a hideous monster ready to strike at a moment's notice.

Happily, however, the Christian era heralding the beautiful doctrine of man's brotherhood and God's fatherhood has presented a brighter, a fairer vision. There has been implanted in the hearts of untold thousands humanitarian ideals that are helping to mold and shape public opinion upon this grave problem of the day. Earnest men in many nations are hoping, are praying that man will subjugate the baser passions of malice and hate to the control of reason and common sense.

We are taught in Holy Writ that "Faith without works is dead." Acting upon belief in the truth of this statement, you, Mr. President, combining vision with practice, have initiated a workable plan for the consummation of our hopes and desires. The conception and execution of this wonderful movement, which has hitherto been regarded as beautifully idealistic but visionary, reflects great credit upon you and your coworkers.

That you have recognized the importance and power of agriculture in the selection of the efficient advisory council is deeply appreciated by us. No act of yours could have pleased agricultural America more than the appointment of Charles S. Barrett to a place on this distinguished body.

This young western republic, of which we are so intensely proud, is now host to the most momentous conference ever assembled upon the earth. The mind of man can not imagine a problem concerning the ongoing of civilization in which the human family could have greater interest than that of disarmament. Scientific research and inventive genius have been so applied to perfecting the agencies for destruction that the annihilation of entire cities is not beyond the possibilities of a single touch of a button. The perpetuity of nations now existing may be dependent upon the establishment of amicable relations at this conference.

The peoples of all climes are keyed up to a high pitch of expectancy. Not that they are so sanguine as to believe the nations here represented will voluntarily scrap all fleets and disband all armies. But the fact that the powers of the world are represented here at all is an omen that inspires us with hope and adds to our faith, and is within itself the most hopeful sign of the age.

Farmers of America have ever held in highest reverence the traditions of our forefathers. In our veins flows the blood of a liberty-loving ancestry. No class or clan responds more readily to a call for defense of those liberties, nor shall we allow any to lead us in the call to stack arms in the interest of peace; so to-day we present you with a copy of resolutions adopted by the National Farmers' Union pledging every ounce of our ability toward the success of this movement which is so near your heart.

Men can not and will not for long tolerate the use of our modern, cruel, and inhuman agencies of war. Every fiber of our moral being revolts, and every fine attribute of the soul cringes at the thought of such wanton barbarity. Our Nation, if it is to hold sacred its enviable position as a defender of the helpless, must allow nothing to hinder the ultimate success of this movement. We believe, Mr. President, that the suggestions offered by our Government as a basis of adjustment are so fair as to make the necessity for compromise extremely remote.

Agricultural America, regardless of religious creed or political affiliation, is heart and soul with you. Our wives and children offer in their daily devotions a petition to the great Creator for the success of this conference. We have envisioned as an aftermath of these deliberations a series of conferences ultimately resulting in the coming of a time when the scriptural prophecy would become literally true and our swords would be beaten into plowshares and pruning hooks; when the busy marts of our cities would hear not again the rumble and roll of marching armies; when the bosom of the sea would bear no burden save that of legitimate commerce and trade; and when the mothers of the race might rear their sons for the pursuits of happiness and peace and not for war.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its chief clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

S. 2124. An act to relinquish, release, remise, and quitclaim all right, title, and interest of the United States of America in and to all the lands contained within sections 17 and 20, township 3 south, range 1 west, St. Stephens meridian, Alabama;

S. 405. An act for the relief of Harold Kernan;

S. 2004. An act for the relief of the First International Bank of Sweetgrass, Mont.;

S. 2468. An act providing for the sale and disposal of public lands within the area heretofore surveyed as Tenderfoot Lake, State of Wisconsin; and

S. 1541. An act for the relief of J. P. D. Shiebler.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 7161. An act to authorize certain desert land claimants who entered the military or naval service of the United States during the War with Germany to make final proof of their entries;

H. R. 5511. An act for the relief of John Cestnik, jr.;

H. R. 2205. An act to add certain lands on the North Fork of the Shoshone River to the Shoshone National Forest;

H. R. 7780. An act for the relief of G. Fred Roach and others;

H. R. 6961. An act granting certain lands to the State of Alabama for the use of the Searcy Hospital for the Colored Insane;

H. R. 3116. An act validating the homestead entry of Mike Campbell for certain public land in Alaska;

H. R. 6864. An act authorizing exchanges of lands within the Rainier National Forest in the State of Washington; and

H. R. 6679. An act to amend section 108 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 3250. An act to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to convey to August S. Peabody certain land in Galveston County, Tex.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Senate resolution 186.

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. HENRY DELAWARE FLOOD, late a Representative in Congress from the State of Virginia.

Resolved, That a committee of eight Senators be appointed by the Vice President to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

And that the Vice President had appointed under the second resolution, Mr. SWANSON, Mr. GLASS, Mr. HARRISON, Mr. CARAWAY, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. CURTIS, Mr. MCKINLEY, and Mr. WILLIS as the committee on the part of the Senate.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 405. An act for the relief of Harold Kernan; to the Committee on War Claims.

S. 1541. An act for the relief of J. P. D. Shiebler; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 1591. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to revive with amendments an act to incorporate the Medical Society of the District of Columbia," approved July 7, 1838, as amended; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

S. 2004. An act for the relief of the First International Bank of Sweetgrass, Mont.; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 2124. An act to relinquish, release, remise, and quitclaim all right, title, and interest of the United States of America in and to all the lands contained within sections 17 and 20, township 3 south, range 1 west, St. Stephens meridian, Alabama; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 2144. An act for the relief of Melquiades Sanchez; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 2211. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents in certain cases to missionary or religious organizations; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

S. 2249. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to donate certain obsolete ordnance to the University of South Dakota; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 2468. An act providing for the sale and disposal of public lands within the area heretofore surveyed as Tenderfoot Lake, State of Wisconsin; to the Committee on Public Lands.

S. 2682. An act to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901," and the acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PRINT OF REVENUE LAW OF 1921.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I call up House concurrent resolution No. 34 from the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington calls up a concurrent resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 34.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 30,000 additional copies of Public Law No. 98, known as the revenue law of 1921, of which 2,000 shall be for the Senate, 22,000 shall be for the House, 1,000 shall be for the Senate document room, 2,000 for the House document room, 1,000 for the Committee on Finance of the Senate, and 2,000 for the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer amendments as follows:

In line 2 strike out the word "thirty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "sixty"; in line 4 strike out "two" and insert "ten"; and in line 5 strike out "twenty-two" and insert "forty-four."

These amendments double the number of copies of the tax laws which the resolution calls for. The Members will remember that shortly before adjournment of the first session a House resolution was passed calling for the printing of these laws up to $500 worth. That distribution secured each Member about 33 copies. A large number of Members have asked for additional copies. In addition the clerks of the Ways and Means Committee state that the number allotted to them was not nearly sufficient to supply the demand, and a similar statement comes from the document room. The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee introduced a resolution calling for 30,000 copies, of which 2,000 should be for the Senate, 20,000 for the House, and 2,000 for the House document room, and a certain number for the two committees. It has developed that that would not be quite sufficient. The Senators were of the opinion that the Senate should have about 10,000 copies, and it was also thought that the House should have more than 50 additional copies, to be distributed through the folding room. The allotment will be about 100 copies per Member. So I shall offer these amendments.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think a Member will have any occasion to use 100 copies of this revenue law?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, if the requests to my own office for the next week should be what they have been in the last 10 days, some of them by telegraph, I am sure we will need 100 copies, if not more.

Mr. WINGO. I have over 100 on my own files.

Mr. MANN. I have not got one.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I congratulate the gentleman from Illinois; but he lives in a great city, with world-famous newspapers, which have printed complete digests of the law, no doubt.

Mr. MANN. And my city pays more taxes than the gentleman's State, and more people pay taxes. But I have no objection to the resolution.

Mr. WINGO. I will state that two of the gentleman's clients make up their tax list in my district.

Mr. TILSON. Is there not more reason that they should be distributed through the document room, inasmuch as some of the Members do not wish to use them at all and some need more than the allotment calls for?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The committee has given a good deal of attention to that. When they supply a rush order through the document room, before you can turn around three times certain active Members or certain business interests have gotten them all. We have thought of bringing in an amendment to provide that if the distribution was not concluded in 15 days there should be a redistribution.

Mr. MANN. Of course, many people want the law. This law is printed already. Why not print it in annotated form? That is what the people want.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would like to see that done.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I think it should be said that in New York and Chicago and other large cities the trust companies make it their business to publish the law. Certain trust companies had the law printed so that they were distributed the day after it was passed.

Mr. SNELL. Does not the gentleman think it would be preferable that the regulations to be issued by the Treasury Department be printed for general distribution?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I believe, when the regulations are completed, if we desire the information, we can have them printed.

Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 2, strike out the word "thirty" and insert "sixty."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman explain what the amendment is?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The committee, after consultation with the clerks of the Ways and Means Committee, decided on 30,000, but the Senate decided that the 1,000 given to the Senate was not enough.

Mr. DOWELL. This is to increase it from 30,000 to 60,000?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; double the amount.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. There is another amendment in line 4.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, strike out the word "two" and insert in lieu thereof the word "ten."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. There is another amendment in line 5.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 5, strike out the word "twenty-two" and insert in lieu thereof the word "forty-four."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGES.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York offers a report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 242.

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 9103, "A bill for the appointment of additional district judges for certain courts of the United States to provide for annual conferences of certain judges of United States courts, to authorize the designation, assignment, and appointment of judges outside their districts and for other purposes," and to consider the same under the general rules of the House.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, the resolution just presented simply provides for the immediate consideration under the general rules of the House of H. R. 9103, a bill for creating additional district judges and for changes in the existing law, as set forth in the title.

There are four propositions in this bill. The main proposition is for the appointment of 22 additional district judges. The second is for the calling of an annual conference of the senior judges in the various districts by the Chief Justice of the United States for the survey of existing conditions concerning the Federal business in the various districts. The third is for the increasing of the daily expense account of the judges when traveling and away from home on official business. The fourth is to provide that any one of these judges may be assigned to other districts than his own without his consent.

Of course, the main provision of the bill is the increase of 22 additional judges. That is recommended for the following reasons: On the 1st of July the district courts of the United States had over 156,000 cases on their calendars. Of these there were 9,700 civil cases, 56,000 criminal cases, nearly 8,000 admiralty and various other cases.

There is so much business on the calendars of the United States courts at the present time because of laws that have been passed during the last two or three sessions of Congress, creating additional business for those courts, that it is impossible with the present judicial machinery to clear the dockets or give the people of the country the service they are entitled to have. These laws include the antinarcotic law, the espionage act, the laws against smuggling, the auto-theft law, the income-tax law, and especially the enforcement of the national prohibition act.

The records show that criminal business in the United States since 1912 has increased nearly 800 per cent, and a large portion of this increase comes from the national prohibition act which has been carried by such a large majority every time it has been before this House. And this bill provides for the appointment of additional judges only in those districts where the evidence before the committee shows there is absolutely the need of a judge to facilitate public business.

In this connection I want to call special attention to the conditions existing in the southern district of New York, one of the worst in the whole country. There we have four judges for about 4,000,000 people, and on the 20th of July there were over 20,000 cases on the calendars awaiting disposition. A great many of these cases deal with admiralty matters, and it is very injurious to the interests concerned when it is impossible to get those cases considered for a period of one, two, or three years. The character of the witnesses in these admiralty cases is such that they are scattered all over the world, and it is practically impossible to get them together unless the case can be heard within a reasonable length of time, and as a result of the conditions legitimate business has suffered materially.

The civil cases in a great many of these courts are almost entirely denied any attention whatever on account of the more pressing criminal cases. In the southern district of New York alone, in the last three years, 33 judges from other districts have been assigned there at an additional expense of about $35,000, or nearly enough to pay for the salaries of the additional judges for that district carried in this bill, and it has not been as satisfactory nor produced as good results.

I am incorporating a statement of extra expenses for this district as furnished by the Department of Justice:

Statement of expenses paid district and circuit judges, together with period of service, incident to holding court in the southern district of New York during the two-year period from Oct. 1, 1918, to Sept. 30, 1920.

The actual expense to be incurred by this bill for the creation of the additional judges, their stenographers, court attendants, and everything, will be about $211,000 per year, but the fines, forfeitures, and so forth, will much more than pay the additional cost, and give people the service they are entitled to receive.

But the real question at issue is that it is absolutely necessary to create these positions in order to facilitate the public business.

This bill has been demanded by the Attorney General's office, It is approved by the Chief Justice of the United States, and in general it tends toward the dispatch of public business, which should be the desire of Congress. I trust the rule will receive your approval.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. How are these judges to be appointed—from the United States as a whole, or so many from each State?

Mr. SNELL. They are to be appointed from each district if after a careful investigation of the condition of affairs in that district it is shown that the district needs a judge.

Mr. HUDSPETH. But where do they have to reside?

Mr. SNELL. The judge has to be a resident of the district to which he is appointed.

Mr. HUDSPETH. As I understand, there are two to be appointed from Texas.

Mr. SNELL. There is one for the northern district of Texas.

Mr. HUDSPETH. He will have to reside in the northern district of Texas?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. SNELL. Certainly.

Mr. LAZARO. The gentleman said the creation of these judgeships was necessary on account of the many laws which were enacted during the war.

Mr. SNELL. Not entirely. Part of them during the war, and other enactments of Congress following the war.

Mr. LAZARO. Is this to be temporary or permanent?

Mr. SNELL. There is a provision in the law that after four years, when one of the judges dies, application must be made to the Chief Justice of the United States and a showing made that they actually need a new judge, or no new judge will be appointed.

If there are no other questions, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I notice a provision in the bill to the effect that the judges may be transferred from their own districts to other districts for the purpose of transacting business there. I assume that these transfers are simply temporary in character?

Mr. SNELL. They are temporary in character, to take care of the congested condition—to take care of the congestion in the district to which he is assigned.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. And when such congestion is relieved they will go back.

Mr. SNELL. All transfers are merely temporary.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York ordering the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9103, for the appointment of additional district judges for certain courts of the United States, to provide for annual conferences of certain judges of the United States courts, and to authorize the designation, assignment, and appointment of the judges outside their districts, and for other purposes.

Pending that I want, if possible, to agree on time. How much time does the gentleman from Kentucky think is desired for general debate in the consideration of this bill?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I should think an hour and a half on a side would be ample.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I should like to know if I can get half an hour. I have an important matter which I desire to present to the committee.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I think the gentleman ought to get along with less time than that.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I do not feel like consenting to a limitation of time unless I can have at least 20 minutes.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Suppose we make it two hours on a side. I think the gentleman can be accommodated. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to two hours on a side, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] and the other half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to four hours, half of that time to be controlled by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] and half by himself. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9103.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9103, with Mr. STAFFORD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the following number of district judges for the United States district courts in the districts specified, the said appointments to be in addition to those now authorized by law:

For the district of Massachusetts, 2; for the eastern district of New York, 1; for the southern district of New York, 2; for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, 1; for the western district of Pennsylvania, 1; for the eastern district of Virginia, 1; for the northern district of Texas, 1; for the southern district of Florida, 1; for the eastern district of Michigan, 1; for the northern district of Ohio, 1; for the middle district of Tennessee, 1; for the northern district of Illinois, 1; for the eastern district of Illinois, 1; for the district of Minnesota, 1; for the eastern district of Missouri, 1; for the western district of Missouri, 1; for the eastern district of Oklahoma, 1; for the district of Montana, 1; for the northern district of California, 1; for the southern district of California, 1; and for the district of Arizona, 1. Said judges shall be residents of the districts for which appointed and shall receive the same salary and allowances and shall possess, exercise, and perform the same jurisdiction, powers, and duties as is now provided by law.

SEC. 2. That the Chief Justice of the United States, as soon as may be after the passage of this act, may summon the senior circuit judge of each judicial circuit of the United States, and such district judges as he may deem proper, to a conference to be held at Washington, in the District of Columbia, or at such other place as he may designate. And it shall be the duty of the said Chief Justice to annually call such a conference and summon said judges thereto, to be held as aforesaid, during the last week in September in each year hereafter. In case of the disability of the Chief Justice, the senior justice of the Supreme Court of the United States shall perform the duties herein imposed, and in case any judge summoned to a conference is unable to attend the Chief Justice or the senior justice of the Supreme Court, as the case may be, may designate and summon any other judge of the circuit or district to attend said conference and participate in same. It shall be the duty of every judge, when summoned as aforesaid, to attend such conference and to remain throughout its proceedings unless excused.

The said judges shall report as to the condition of the dockets in their circuits or districts and submit recommendations as to the needs thereof and advise as to the improvement or expedition of the administration of justice in the courts of the United States.

The district judge of each United States district court, on or before the 1st day of August in each year, shall prepare and submit to the senior circuit judge in which said district is located a report setting forth the state of business in said district court, including the number and character of cases on the docket, the business in arrears, and such other facts pertinent to the business disposed of and pending as said district judge may deem proper, together with recommendations as to the need of additional judicial assistance for the disposal of business for the year next ensuing.

These reports shall be laid before the conference hereinbefore provided by said senior circuit judge, together with such recommendations as he deems proper. In districts having more than one district judge the report herein required shall be prepared and submitted by the district judge who is senior in length of service. The Chief Justice shall be the presiding officer at the conference called hereunder.

Said conference shall make a comprehensive survey of the conditions of business in the courts of the United States and prepare plans and schedules for the assignment and transfer of judges to or from circuits or districts where the state of the docket or the condition of business indicates the need therefor, and shall submit such suggestions to the various courts as may seem in the interest of uniformity and expedition of business.

The Attorney General shall, upon request of the Chief Justice, report to said conference on matters relating to the business of the several courts of the United States, with particular reference to causes or proceedings to which the United States may be a party, together with such recommendations or requests as may be deemed proper. The Attorney General shall not be a member of said conference.

The Chief Justice and each justice or judge summoned to and attending said conference shall be allowed his actual expenses of travel and his necessary expenses for subsistence, not to exceed $15 per day, to be paid as provided in section 8 hereof.

SEC. 3. That section 13 of the Judicial Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 13. That when any district judge is prevented, by reason of any disability, from holding any stated or appointed term of his court, and a certificate to that effect is submitted under the seal of the court by the clerk thereof to any circuit judge of the judicial circuit in which said district is located, or in cases of the absence of all the said circuit judges, to the circuit justice of said judicial circuit, such circuit judge or circuit justice may, if in his judgment the public interests require, designate, assign, and appoint any district judge of any district court within the same judicial circuit to hold said court for the whole or a part of said term, and to discharge all the judicial duties of the judge so prevented by illness or disability, during the period of such disability and for such further time as the business of such court and the circuit may seem to require.

"Whenever it is found impracticable to designate, assign, and appoint another district judge within the same circuit to discharge the duties of a district judge prevented by reason of any disability from holding a term of his court as aforesaid, and a certificate to that effect under the seal of the court is presented by a circuit judge or the circuit justice to the Chief Justice of the United States, he may, if in his opinion the public interests so require, designate, assign, and appoint a district judge of an adjoining judicial circuit, if practicable, if not, of any judicial circuit, to hold said court for the whole or a part of said term and to discharge all the judicial duties of said judge so prevented and for such further time as the business of the courts of such districts and circuits may seem to require.

"Designations, assignments, and appointments made hereunder shall be filed in the office of the clerks and entered on the minutes of both the court from and to which the judge is designated, assigned, and appointed, and a certified copy of such designation, assignment, and appointment, under the seal of the court of the justice or judge making same, shall be delivered to the judge thus designated, assigned, and appointed."

SEC. 4. That section 14 of the Judicial Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 14. That whenever by reason of the accumulation or arrears of business, or in case of any special or urgent business, in any district court in the judgment of the senior circuit judge or, in his absence, the circuit justice of the judicial circuit in which said district is located, there is need for additional judges in order to expedite the business of said court, such senior circuit judge or circuit justice may, and on request of the district judge of the district court where such accumulation, arrears, or urgency exists, shall designate, assign, and appoint any other district judge or judges within the said judicial circuit to hold a district court for a stated or appointed term or for a special term, in order to relieve such accumulation, arrears, or urgency, and such judge or judges when so designated, assigned, and appointed shall have the same powers and exercise the same jurisdiction and discharge the same judicial duties as the judge appointed for the district court to which such designation, assignment, or appointment is made. The same certification shall be made hereunder as is provided in the preceding section."

SEC. 5. That the Chief Justice of the United States, whenever it shall be certified to him by the senior circuit judge of any judicial circuit, or by the circuit justice thereof, that it is not practicable to designate, assign, and appoint a sufficient number of district judges of other districts within said judicial circuit, including any territory assigned to said circuit, to expedite the business or relieve the accumulation or urgency of business in any district court, may, if in his judgment the public interests so require, designate, assign, and appoint any judge of any district court in any other judicial circuit to hold a district court within the circuit where said accumulation or urgency exists, and to have and exercise all the powers that are vested in the judge thereof. Such certification, designation, assignment, and appointment shall be made as provided in section 3 hereof.

Each of said district judges may, in the case of designation, assignment, and appointment under the provisions of this act, hold separately at the same time a district court in such district or territory and discharge all the judicial duties of said district or territorial judge therein.

SEC. 6. That section 18 of the Judicial Code is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 18. That the Chief Justice of the United States, or the circuit justice of any judicial circuit, or the senior circuit judge thereof, may, if the public interests so require, designate, assign, and appoint any circuit judge of a judicial circuit to hold a district court within said circuit."

SEC. 7. That whenever it shall be certified to the Chief Justice of the United States by the Chief Justice of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia or in his absence by an associate justice of said court of appeals, that on account of the accumulation or urgency of business in said district it is impracticable for the judges of the supreme court of said district to relieve such accumulation or urgency of business the Chief Justice of the United States may, if in his judgment the public interests so require, designate and appoint the judge of any district court in any circuit to sit in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia and to have and to exercise within said district to which he is so assigned the same powers as are vested in a supreme judge thereof.

The certification, designation, assignment, and appointment hereunder shall conform so far as possible to the provisions of section 3 of this act.

SEC. 8. That whenever under the provisions of this act or of existing law a circuit or district judge is designated, assigned, or appointed to, or does hold, district court or transact other official business at any place other than his official place of residence, he shall, while so holding court or transacting such other official business be paid his necessary and actual expenses of travel, together with his reasonable and necessary expenses for maintenance, not to exceed $15 per day, which payments shall be made by the marshal of the district in which such court is held or other official business is transacted upon the written certificate of the judge incurring such expenses.

SEC. 9. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent or in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 4, after the semicolon, strike out the words "for the eastern district of Virginia, one;"

Page 2, line 19, after the word "law," insert a colon and the words: "Provided, however, That after four years from the passage of this act the death, resignation, or removal of any district judge in any district for which additional appointments are herein authorized shall not create a vacancy to authorize the appointment of a successor, unless, within 60 days after such death, resignation, or removal, the Attorney General of the United States and the senior circuit judge of the judicial circuit embracing the court and district affected, shall certify in writing to the President that the condition and volume of business in the district courts within said judicial circuit are such that in their judgment the public interest requires the appointment of such successor."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, this measure is designed to take care of the situation in the Federal district courts throughout the country, which has arisen by reason of the increase in business, the congestion of dockets, and the passage by Congress of laws extending the jurisdiction of Federal courts and also adding to Federal criminal statutes. Heretofore Congress has seen fit to make the increase in judges by particular districts. The Attorney General shortly after taking office invited several gentlemen to act as a voluntary commission to look into the condition of business in the Federal district courts. That commission was made up of Hon. J. E. Sater, United States judge from Ohio; Hon. John C. Pollock, United States district judge of Kansas; Hon. William E. Grubb, United States judge in Alabama; Mr. William H. Hayward, the United States district attorney for the southern district of New York; and Charles F. Clyne, United States attorney for the northern district of Illinois, practically the city of Chicago. Mr. George E. Strong, one of the Attorney General's assistants, acted as secretary of this commission. This commission, after careful consideration of the dockets and the conditions of business in the United States courts, prepared a report which was submitted to the Attorney General on the 21st of July. This report recommended the appointment of 18 district judges at large, 2 to be appointed from each of the 9 judicial circuits. It also recommended that there be amendments to existing law providing for facilitating the designation and appointment of these judges to hold court in other districts and even in other circuits, if necessary. A bill was introduced carrying out such recommendation, at the request of the Attorney General, in the Senate and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary in the Senate. That committee held hearings at which appeared the Chief Justice of the United States, who, by the way, sat with this commission appointed by the Attorney General and participated in its considerations, and he indorsed their recommendations to the Senate Judiciary Committee.

The members of this commission also appeared before the Senate Judiciary Committee and explained the recommendations which they had made. Their recommendations were also supplemented by the testimony of the Attorney General.

Shortly after the hearings before the Senate committee the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] and myself went over the recommendations of this voluntary commission as presented to the Senate and also went over in a general way the testimony heard by the subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee—of which I have the honor to be the chairman—upon various individual bills. After conferring with other members of the committee and several Members of the House, it was felt that it would be wiser if legislation were enacted assigning these judges to particular districts and eliminating the appointment of the judges at large. Personally, I felt that it would be much wiser to have a United States judge assigned to a particular district, have him have a legal and official residence in that district, and perhaps in that way he would be more familiar with the laws of the particular State in which he was appointed and to which he would be assigned, and that in viewing the situation as a whole it would be better to so appoint and assign these judges as to take care of the congestion, which is very apparent. I think every circuit is taken care of in the bill pending except the fourth circuit, for which provision was made in the bill as introduced; but by amendment in the committee one district was eliminated. An additional judge in that circuit has been eliminated. A judge was provided for the eastern district of Virginia—and I have a letter which was addressed by the present judge of the eastern district of Virginia to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE], which Mr. MOORE has transmitted to me with permission to make its contents public. In that letter Judge Groner states that in his opinion the eastern district of Virginia will not require an additional judge; that while there has been increase in admiralty cases and other classes of cases, he feels that with the cooperation of the bar, which he will undoubtedly be able to get, he can keep the work practically current. I think that is in substance the statement in his letter, but I shall, with the permission of the committee, insert the letter in full in the RECORD:

OFFICE UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE,
EASTERN DISTRICT OF VIRGINIA,
Norfolk, November 26, 1921.

HON. R. WALTON MOORE,
United States House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MOORE: I am very glad, indeed, to have your letter of November 25.

Of course, I knew of the recommendation of the Attorney General to create 18 additional district judges, alloted proportionately to the 9 different circuits, but my only information of the Walsh bill came as a result of a newspaper clipping that was sent to me a few days ago.

I am whole-heartedly opposed to the appointment of an additional district judge in this district, because, in the first place, of the absolute lack of any occasion for it; and, in the second place, because I foresee as a result of such an appointment, if it should be made, such a division of responsibility as will create untold difficulties, and, further, because the character of the work is such as to make any fair division of it practically impossible.

There is not, and never has been, enough work in this district to keep two judges even reasonably busy. Except for the admiralty work, all the criminal, equity, and common-law cases could be disposed of, if counsel were ready, in less than three months in every year. The admiralty work expanded during the war and immediately after the war, due, as, of course, you know, to the unusual conditions of shipping in and around Hampton Roads; but of the 271 admiralty cases stated to have been on the docket as of June 30, 1921, every one of them ready for trial will have been disposed of before June 30, 1922, and there will be at that date, if nothing unusual occurs, less than 50 live admiralty cases then on the docket. I am sure I am correct in saying that any litigant in any branch of the law in this court who is industrious in the preparation of his case can get a trial and a decision in less than four months after the suit is instituted.

I have looked over the figures in the statistical part of the report of the committee, and note that the total of pending cases in this district as of July 1 last (this is just one month after my appointment by President Harding) was a little more than a thousand. Of this number something over 400 are stated to be bankruptcy cases. There is not, and there has not been since the bankruptcy law was passed, a single bankruptcy case which has been delayed as much as 10 days in its final disposition by reason of lack of time or attention on the part of the court. There is to-day not a single petition for review, application for discharge, confirmation of composition, or order for sale of property in bankruptcy pending and unacted on, and these embrace about all the matters in bankruptcy in which the action of the court is required. The four hundred and odd cases shown on the docket are the accumulation of twenty-odd years and result from failure on the part of counsel to ask for discharges or cases perhaps, in which a few dollars of the fund remain but which it is impossible to distribute for one reason or another, but it does not reflect the real condition of the bankruptcy docket, which is completely up to date.

The pending criminal cases as of July 1 last are stated as numbering about 250. I am sure there are not to-day five criminal cases which were on the docket on July 1—unless they are cases in which appeals have been taken or which, for some extraordinary reason, could not be tried—except the cases classified as "fugitives from justice," whose names are kept on the docket four or five years in the hope that they may be caught. There are probably from 125 to 150 of these.

The criminal business has increased somewhat since July 1, but the character of the increase has been trifling and the cases are such as are tried in the State courts at the rate of 15 to 20 a day. The criminal docket is now up to date. There are only two or three criminal cases pending on the Alexandria docket which could be tried, less than half a dozen in Richmond, and before this term of court concludes there will be less than half a dozen in Norfolk. The criminal docket is regularly cleaned up at every term of court, and the only reason a criminal case ever goes over is either from lack of witnesses or good cause shown by counsel so that a trial can not be forced.

Every civil case—common law and equity—on the Alexandria docket ready for trial last July was tried. The same was true in the case of Richmond in October, and before the adjournment of the jury at this (November) term of court here every common-law case in which a trial can be had, or is asked for, will have been disposed of. The equity and common-law dockets are up to date and are easily kept up to date. The miscellaneous docket which embraces pure-food condemnation cases, suits that are brought on forfeiture of bonds, and matters of that kind, has been materially reduced since I became judge, and there is nothing pending on it.

The only business in this court which promises to keep me reasonably busy for the next four or five months is the admiralty work. I am now setting cases in admiralty for December, January, and February, and every lawyer who has an admiralty case which he wishes tried, or is able to try, finds no difficulty in getting a date set for the trial and in getting it tried and disposed of. If the admiralty work, which has shown a steady diminution over the past six months, were not embraced in the work of the judge of this court, the position would be one for a lazy judge. With the admiralty work there is just enough to do to stimulate the ambition and maintain the interest of the judge. To divide it up, if it were possible to divide it up, between two judges, would be to create a situation of unhappiness and idleness for both judges. Judge Waddill, whom I succeeded on June 1, last, lived in Richmond, where only about 10 per cent of the work is, and spent the major portion of his time there, and yet was able to keep the work up, to sit in the Circuit Court of Appeals more frequently than any other district judge, and to spend from a month to six weeks in other districts than his own sitting for other judges on account of their illness or incapacity.

Living in Norfolk, as I do, where the great bulk of the work is, I am sure that with reasonable industry I can hear and decide every case as rapidly as the lawyers can bring them into court, and have ample time for leisurely study and consideration of matters submitted to me, and, in addition, reasonable vacations from time to time. Whatever the necessities may be in other districts, as to which I have no information, it is undoubtedly and undeniably a fact that conditions in this district do not justify at this time the appointment of an additional judge, and the appointment of one would accomplish none of the purposes which I believe the Attorney General had in mind in his recommendation, or, doubtless, which Mr. WALSH had in mind in the preparation of his bill.

You were good enough to say in your letter that if I would write you the facts as to this district you would withhold the source of your information. I have no wish to impose this condition, but, on the contrary, would be very glad to have you present this letter to Mr. WALSH, if he is willing to receive it, and to supplement it with your own observations and knowledge of conditions in this district.

Yours, sincerely,

D. LAWRENCE GRONER,
United States Judge.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. In the State of Texas, about two years ago, we had an additional judgeship created. I am wondering what testimony there was before the committee about that specific jurisdiction.

Mr. WALSH. I shall come to the particular districts a little later.

Mr. RAYBURN. And in the course of the gentleman's discussion I would like him to express his opinion as to the policy set out in the language at the bottom of page 2, providing that after the death, resignation, or removal of any of the district judges for which additional appointments are authorized there shall be no appointment unless the Attorney General and the senior circuit judge of the particular circuit shall deem it necessary.

Mr. WALSH. I will come to that later in my remarks.

Mr. Chairman, after the introduction of the bill H. R. 8875 a hearing was held by the full committee of the Committee on the Judiciary on the part of the House. At that hearing the Chief Justice of the United States appeared, as did the Attorney General and the Assistant Attorney General. That bill was introduced, as I have said, as the result of consideration by the subcommittee of individual bills and also as the result of conference by the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] and myself, and provided for two or three districts which are not included in the present measure. At the conclusion of the hearings a conference was held with the Attorney General, and also with the Chief Justice of the United States, and it had been arranged that that conference should be attended by the chairman of the Senate subcommittee, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], but he was ill during the entire week in which these two conferences were held, and was unable to be present.

The bill H. R. 9103 was gone over by the Attorney General, and in the main the districts therein provided for were stated by the Attorney General to be in need of additional judicial assistance. He made one or two suggestions at the conferences which were incorporated in the bill. He has written a letter expressing his views on this measure, which is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., November 14, 1921.

Hon. JOSEPH WALSH, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN WALSH: Your bill, dated November 14, providing "for the appointment of additional district judges for certain courts of the United States, to provide for annual conferences of certain judges of United States courts, to authorize the designation, assignment, and appointment of judges outside their districts, and for other purposes," is received, and I am very much in favor of its general purpose and scope, and in particular the provision for the conference and for elasticity in the judicial system. However, I have already indorsed S. 2433, a bill introduced in the Senate providing for 18 Federal district judges at large, and I can not consistently do more than state that if the provision for judgeships at large is objectionable to the Judiciary Committee of the House, I would not be opposed to the substitution of 23 permanently assigned judges, as provided in your bill.

I believe that 23 permanently assigned judges, assigned to the districts in your bill, are the least possible number which should be created. In general they cover the principal points of permanent congestion and are so distributed that temporary congestion can be relieved from time to time. I prefer the provision in your bill eliminating the consent feature in the Senate bill which requires the consent of a district judge before he can be assigned to another district, as this oftentimes is embarrassing.

Thanking you for the interest you are taking in affording relief to the Federal courts, I am,

Respectfully, yours,

H. M. DAUGHERTY, Attorney General.

Originally an additional judge was given to the district of Colorado. It was felt that geographically that circuit was entitled to an additional judge, but it was found—and I was advised, although I have endeavored to confirm it—that one of the commerce court judges has been helping out in the district of Colorado.

I have since been informed by Members of the Colorado delegation that they have no knowledge of any assistance being received in that particular district. However, that court was eliminated upon the recommendation of both the Attorney General and his assistant, as testified to before the committee, and an additional judge was given to the middle district of Tennessee. Tennessee has a district known as the "middle district," with a clerk and, I think, a marshal, but no judge, the court there being held by the judge of the eastern district. But upon the suggestion and recommendation of the Attorney General a judge was given to the middle district of Tennessee.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WALSH. I prefer to make my statement just for a few moments, and then I will be glad to yield to questions.

The increase in business is mostly, of course, upon the criminal side of the court. There have been a large number of cases brought as a result of the national prohibition act, although, I think, they furnish only between 8 and 10 per cent of the increase upon the criminal side of the court. There have been increases in the offenses against the national banking law, the auto theft act, the so-called Mann Act, the hours of service act, food and drugs act, the meat inspection act, in the animal quarantine act, in the plant quarantine act, the migratory bird act, and in cases of illicit distilling, comprehending offenses against the international revenue laws as distinguished from cases under the national prohibition law. There have been also increases upon the civil side of the court, and in the report filed upon this bill there is set forth the references made to that increase.

The gentleman from New York summarized the class of cases pending upon July 1 of this year, and it has been shown from the statistics that criminal business in the last eight or nine years in the various courts has increased about 800 per cent.

Now, with reference to the particular districts. In the first circuit, which includes the States of Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Porto Rico, there have been some 8,694 cases on the 1st of July, of which number 6,834 were pending in the district of Massachusetts. That district has a population of 3,850,000, in round numbers, and has had one judge, and comprehends but one district. It sits at Boston, and, I think, also at Springfield, in the western part of the State. Of the 6,800 cases pending in Massachusetts, several hundred—I think possibly 2,900 or 3,000 of them—are cases under the selective service law, and I am advised that those cases in that district and in New York, and also in New Jersey, are very numerous, but that a comparatively small number of them will be tried. So much time has elapsed, and in many cases the records are so incomplete, that trials will not be had, but the cases will be disposed of without occupying any great length of time on the part of the court.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I agreed to yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER].

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WALSH. May I have 10 minutes more?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa now.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I was going to ask about the Tennessee middle district. You say the district was created without a judge. Why do you have to make provision for him in this bill? There is simply a vacancy there.

Mr. WALSH. There never has been a judge. They made the district, and by the law the judge of the eastern district presides in the middle district. We are now giving the middle district a judge.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Then the judge of the eastern district has taken care of two district?

Mr. WALSH. Two districts.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman stated that in the criminal business of the courts the courts had increased some 800 per cent in a few years. I did not understand in how many years.

Mr. WALSH. I think in 8 or 10 years.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Would it not be possible to relieve some of the courts of some of these cases of the lesser sort, and would it not be a less expensive way?

Mr. WALSH. The suggestion has been made that the United States commissioners be created as a sort of inferior court of limited jurisdiction, but I think the objection to that has been that if they are given further judicial powers or are constituted as a court it would result in their being appointed for life, and the imposition of further judicial powers upon them would enormously increase the expense.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I notice that this bill provides for an additional judge for the northern district of Illinois. Is that the district in which Judge Landis presides?

Mr. WALSH. I was about to reach these different districts. If the gentleman will desist for a minute, I will be glad to yield to him later on. The next circuit comprises New York, Vermont, and Connecticut. New York City, which is in the southern district of New York, has four judges, with a population of 3,801,364. They are also assisted at times by judges from one or more other districts. That is the only district to which judges under the existing law can now be sent from other districts or circuits without their consent. They even sent one of the judges from the Florida district, and I think Judge Mack, one of the commerce judges, has been sitting in New York quite frequently and has been there until a short time ago. In the last three or four years, I am informed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], the records show that there have been from 30 to 33 outside judges helping out there. That is a very populous district, as I said, having 3,801,364 population, with 20,170 cases in the southern district of New York, and several hundred of these are selective-service cases. But in all of these districts, if you will deduct the selective-service cases and the bankruptcy cases, which in most districts do not require a great amount of time, you will still see that there is need of additional judicial assistance.

It seems to me I may so state in passing, as my time will soon again expire, that if Congress in its wisdom passes legislation which makes offenses of certain acts under the Federal law, there also rests a duty upon Congress to provide sufficient judicial machinery when persons are charged with these crimes to permit them to have a trial and an adjudication without undue delay. Now, in the New York and California districts they have a great amount of admiralty business, and, as you know, in those cases it is essential that trial should be had with reasonable promptness; otherwise the witnesses who may be desired, many of whom are seamen, may be within the jurisdiction of the court or of the United States to-day and six months from to-day or a year from to-day they may be in another country. And so it was felt that in New York they were entitled to two additional judges, a bill to that effect having already passed the Senate and having been favorably reported by the House committee.

I will say in that connection that Arizona, Michigan, New York, and Oklahoma are provided for in bills now on the calendar. I think, perhaps with the exception of Oklahoma, that also California, Missouri, Florida, Massachusetts, and Tennessee have bills pending which have either had hearings upon them by the committee or have had favorable recommendation and have been reported to the House or have been reported to the Senate.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Are all of these special bills now on the calendar included in this bill?

Mr. WALSH. Yes. The number is larger than in the Senate bill, for 18 judges at large.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question right there?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. It is in regard to the southern district of New York. I want to say that the Federal Government has paid out enough money to add new judges there.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, shifting judges entails additional expense.

Now, in the circuit embracing Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware there is a judge given to the eastern district of Pennsylvania. These are populous districts. They have 3,200, 1,900, 3,400, and 3,100 cases, respectively, pending; but even deducting bankruptcy cases pending, there is a large congestion on their dockets.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Do these cases include naturalization cases?

Mr. WALSH. They do not. But in the New Jersey district there are two judges and there are 13,567 cases. It was felt that under the designation and transfer of judges, if the eastern district of Pennsylvania be given an additional judge it might be possible to relieve some of the congestion in the New Jersey district. One reason for the congestion in the New Jersey district is because quite a number of corporations in the past have taken out their charters under the New Jersey law. There is also a large number of service cases in the New Jersey court, but, as I stated, I do not expect any of these will take much time.

In the fourth circuit we provided for a judge of the eastern district of Virginia, and the committee eliminated it. The fifth circuit takes in Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, and Florida, with a population of 14,453,483. We provided for a judge of the northern district of Texas in which there are 1,200 cases in a population of 1,400,000. We also provided for a judge of the southern district of Florida, where of recent years there has been a substantial increase in admiralty cases and also in criminal cases, due to smuggling and the violation of the national prohibition law, due to the proximity of Cuba and the other islands in that locality where considerable smuggling is indulged in.

In the sixth circuit the eastern district of Michigan is provided with a judge, where there are 1,424 cases pending, and a population of 2,456,000 in round numbers, but with a very hard-working judge. The testimony before our committee was that this particular judge sits longer hours and holds court more days than the usual run of United States judges, and the record on that subject exceeds that of any other judge about whom testimony has been heard by the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary.

I referred a moment ago to the middle district of Tennessee, which is in that circuit. In the seventh circuit——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. WALSH. The seventh district embraces Wisconsin, Illinois, and Indiana. We give an additional judge to the northern district of Illinois and also to the eastern district of Illinois. It has been suggested that Cook County, which comprises the northern district—Cook County and a few other counties—might be entitled to two additional judges. But in view of the fact that one of those judges in Chicago has seen fit to accept outside employment at a large salary, it was felt that by the appointment of one additional judge in that district where there are 3,532 cases pending, 1,322 of which are bankruptcy cases, with the assistance of a judge from the eastern district, which is also given an additional judge, they could make some inroads upon that situation there.

Now, I am one of the members of the Judiciary Committee who do not approve of the action of a United States judge in accepting employment such as has been accepted by Judge Landis. [Applause.] I know he is a hard-working and a competent judge. I think perhaps he has some reputation for eccentricity and severity in sentences. I do not know whether that reputation is warranted or not, and I do not care to express any opinion upon it; but I believe that it were better, when a man has received the honor of an appointment to a judgeship of a United States court, if he should give his services to that work and not subject himself to criticism by accepting employment for hire either as a baseball arbitrator or as an arbitrator between lumber associations or coal associations or any other outside interests. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Would the gentleman be willing to accept an amendment that would forbid a judge from engaging in any outside occupation? The Senate Committee on the Judiciary has favorably reported a bill to that effect, providing that a district judge shall confine himself to the work of his judgeship and not accept other employment. Does not the gentleman think it would be desirable to put a provision of that kind into this bill? As I understand, it would be germane to the purposes of the bill, because the bill proposes to amend several sections of the Judicial Code.

Mr. WALSH. I would not want to say offhand that I would favor an amendment to this bill, without seeing the form of it and giving it a little further consideration; but I do think that there ought to be some way of preventing that practice, and if the provisions of section 2 of this bill are agreed to, which provides for the calling of a conference of the senior circuit justices by the Chief Justice of the United States every year in the last week in September, and such district judges as the Chief Justice may see fit to designate to attend that conference, I believe that as a result of that it may be possible to eliminate any further instances like the one which has occurred in the northern district of Illinois.

We provided for a judge for the eastern district of Illinois, where, although the congestion is not as great as in the other districts, yet its boundary lines run fairly close to Chicago, where the court is held for the northern district. It was also felt that in case of necessity a judge for the eastern district could be sent to assist the judge in the district of Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WALSH. I do not know whether the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] has any further time at his disposal. I dislike to ask for further time, but I have not completed what I should like to say about this bill.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KING. What was the reason there was not a judge provided for the southern district of Illinois? What did the committee think about that?

Mr. WALSH. In the southern district of Illinois there are 1,498 cases pending. That situation was brought to the attention of the Attorney General and his assistants, and they felt that if an additional judge were given to the northern district and one to the eastern district, between that additional assistance the entire State could be taken care of. They felt that by putting a judge in the eastern district he would be available to go to Indiana at less expense and upon shorter notice than if he were put in the southern district, which takes in the entire western half and more of the State.

Mr. KING. Is it not a fact that there is more business congestion in the southern district than there is in the eastern district at the present time?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; I will say right here that there are a great many districts not provided for which the statistics show have more cases pending than some of the districts that are provided for; but the assignment was made with a view to their designation and transfer to other districts.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. The gentleman from Massachusetts has stated that he did not approve of a judge accepting other employment.

Mr. WALSH. I yield for a question. I have only five minutes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think it is tantamount to an expression of approval by this Congress to provide for an additional judge for the northern district of Illinois, when one of the judges of that district is acting as a baseball mogul?

Mr. WALSH. I can not quite agree with the gentleman. Of course, the gentleman knows that in the last Congress it was thought that impeachment proceedings should have been brought against Judge Landis, and a former member, Mr. Welty, from Ohio, impeached him upon the floor. That was referred to the Judiciary Committee, and after one or two brief hearings nothing further was done about it.

I should like to speak about the other provisions of the bill. Section 2 provides that the Chief Justice may call a conference of the senior justices of the circuits, and such district judges as he may designate, here at Washington or elsewhere once a year, to make a general survey of the situation in the district courts of the United States and to provide as far as possible in advance for the transfer and assignment of judges from one district to the other, or from one district in one circuit to a district in another circuit, in order that they may relieve the congestion and accumulation of arrears. It was also felt that at this conference the judges called together might arrange a little more uniformity in the matter of sentences perhaps and in the method of dispatching business in the various courts, the conference so called to have no inquisitorial powers and not to impose any regulations of a mandatory character; but it was felt that if these justices could confer once each year and with such district judges as might be called in, it would result in uniformity and tend toward the dispatch of business.

One other provision of the bill is that increasing the allowance of judges assigned outside their districts from $10 per day to $15 per day. I think perhaps that some of you here may appreciate the fact that I could not view that proposition with any alarming degree of enthusiasm, but it was felt on the part of the committee and others that with the great increase which has come in living expenses a United States judge sent outside of his district should receive sufficient to maintain himself in keeping with the dignity and importance of his position; and, of course, that is a reason which has a certain appeal, and it was thought that the increase was warranted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I hesitate to break into the gentleman's time, but at the beginning of a session I think we ought to have time at least to discuss important matters. That increase applies to the present circuit judges who attend to circuits away from their official residence, I take it?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. MANN. What is the practice now? Do they take the full $15 a day, or do they make a statement about their expenses? The gentleman remembers that we had a scandal about that once.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; and as I understand it now they make a statement as to their expenses, and they are paid what the statement shows.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is sure about that?

Mr. WALSH. I am not. I would not want to state that as a positive fact.

Mr. MANN. Is there any case where their expenses are less than $10 per day?

Mr. WALSH. I have not gone into the individual districts.

Mr. MANN. That is the first question I would have asked the Attorney General if the matter had come before me, and the gentleman from Massachusetts is much brighter and more critical than I.

Mr. WALSH. I am sorry, if the gentleman is going to put that reputation upon me.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to submit for consideration a table containing statistics which I have compiled from the Attorney General's report showing business disposed of in the districts provided for in the pending bill for the years 1920 and 1921:

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much to find myself unable to support this bill. It is recognized that there are a great many districts in the United States where a condition of congestion obtains. The facts upon which this bill is based and the method of their being obtained are very unusual in a legislative procedure. Some months ago, after consideration by the Judiciary Committee, it was determined to consult the Attorney General with reference to the condition obtaining in the Federal trial courts. After that consultation the Attorney General appointed a committee to make investigations. The Chief Justice of the United States became chairman of that committee. After investigation of the condition that committee reported favorably the proposition of adding 18 judges to the district judiciary, with the idea that these judges could be moved about over the United States in order to relieve the condition of congestion which obtains in the districts where congestion does obtain. In the meantime the Judiciary Committee had under consideration a number of bills offered to create additional judges in certain congested districts. The Judiciary Committee itself has not investigated independently with reference to the needs in many of the districts where additional judges are by this bill proposed. The Chief Justice of the United States when before the Committee on the Judiciary made this statement:

One of the difficulties of the achievement of the dispatch of business has been the variation of conditions in the different districts and circuits. In some places there would be a judge who had but half his time occupied; in another place there would be a judge who would be overwhelmed with work. This bill introduces a reasonable system of watching and supervising conditions by the judges of the courts of appeal—

And he referred to the bill proposing the creation of 18 judicial judgeships—with a view of having them get at the actual facts as to where the arrears are.

I now come to what I consider a very significent statement made by Judge Taft before our committee. He continues:

You gentlemen are all familiar with the fact that dockets are quite misleading in the number of cases that they seem to show. There is a lot of stuffing in the dockets. Many of the cases ought to be dismissed.

The point I make is, and one of the chief reasons why I am unable to support this bill is, that the Judiciary Committee by its investigation has never determined where those districts are, or the proportion of cases pending there that represent stuffed dockets or cases that ought to be dismissed.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Has the committee any definite information as to the number of hours per day on an average the judges in the districts affected hold court?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. In so far as I know, the Judiciary Committee is not in possession of that information. Perhaps the gentleman in charge of the bill could give the gentleman from Tennessee that information. Very briefly, then, gentlemen, my position is that while I recognize the fact that congestion does obtain in many of the districts of the United States, and that relief is required in many of these districts, yet I am not in possession of information which convinces me that each of these additional judgeships should be provided.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. HILL. Has the gentleman or the committee any information as to the number and classes of cases disposed of in the last current year, in order that that might be compared with the pending cases?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The Attorney General's report is just out, and I have not had opportunity to examine his report, to determine the number of cases disposed of during the year—I believe it ended in June—or of the number of filings that have occurred in those districts. I assume that an examination of the Attorney General's report would disclose those facts.

Mr. HILL. The Attorney General's report does include those facts, because I obtained the information for the district of Maryland for the previous year, but I was not able to obtain the information from the Attorney General's report for the current year.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. It was just issued yesterday, and I assume it is available now for examination. I want to suggest at this time, and I am going to take no more time than to make this suggestion, that at the proper time, I shall offer an amendment—if somebody else does not—with reference to these judges that are to be appointed, to the effect that in the event of death or resignation resulting in a vacancy in a particular district that the Congress shall favorably consider the matter again before another judge is appointed to fill the vacancy. I shall also offer an amendment to reduce the per diem from $15 to $10.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Now, in reference to a question I propounded a minute ago to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], I wish to give notice that at the proper time I shall offer an amendment which, for the information of the gentleman from Massachusetts and other gentlemen, I would like to have read now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MOORE of Virginia: Amend by inserting after section 1 a new section as follows:

"SECTION 1a. That the last sentence of section 1 of the Judicial Code is amended to read as follows:

"Every district judge shall reside in the district or one of the districts for which he is appointed, and shall devote his time to the duties of his office and shall not engage in any other employment for which he receives compensation; and for offending against the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor."

[Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, that amendment is drawn in the exact language of a bill that was reported during the extra session by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, but which has not yet been considered in the Senate. If we are of opinion that the judges shall confine themselves to judicial work, it seems to me that we can not do better than express that opinion in an amendment of that character if this bill is to pass. I offer the amendment as stating a general principle. I do not care about specifying its applicability to any particular locality or to any particular judge. I think it is a good rule to adopt and that it should apply during the future to every judicial district.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall not discuss this bill at any length. I am not a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, but I may say this, that I have given such consideration to the facts the committee has presented as I have found possible.

Mr. STEPHENS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. In one minute.

I have been obliged to come to the conclusion, and I have reached it reluctantly, that we ought not to enact this legislation.

Mr. STEPHENS. Does not the gentleman believe that his amendment should incorporate the district attorneys and assistant district attorneys as well as the judges?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I do not think that is proper. I think that the line is very distinct between the judges and the lawyers who fill the offices the gentleman mentions.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. While there is an ethical difference, as a matter of fact, do you not think that any district attorney can well devote all of his time to the Government's business? I think the Government is entitled to it.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I think that is ordinarily the case.

Mr. HILL. Would not the inclusion of the district attorneys in such a measure deprive the Government of the services of the type of lawyers which they could not get for the salaries paid? Now, for instance, in the district of Maryland the United States district attorney gives practically all of his time to the work of that office, which has increased enormously. He gets $4,000 a year. It is almost impossible to get anyone except young, ambitious men, who want to make a record, to take those offices, and it is the rule in that district that the United States district attorney be allowed to take some private civil cases. I want to ask if that is not the gentleman's personal experience?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. That is largely true. We are all very largely the creatures of convention, and it has come to be considered by the people of our race, conducting government on both sides of the water, that judges should stand apart from the ordinary business of life and not engage in the ordinary occupations. I for one do not like to see any abandonment of that conception of the character and the dignity of the judicial office. And I think, Mr. Chairman, that there is nothing more important than to uphold the judiciary in the estimation of the people at a time when there is so much disorder and so much demoralization. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. MANN. As I understand it, the gentleman's amendment refers to employment or compensation. Chief Justice White was an arbitrator between the Republics of Nicaragua and Costa Rica. I do not know whether he was compensated, but I suppose somebody was compensated. Chief Justice Taft was an arbitrator, in Montreal, appointed before he was made Chief Justice, and served after he was made Chief Justice. Many judges are appointed as arbitrators between employer and employee, and in many other ways. Does the gentleman design to prevent all that and to criticize all that?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. So far as the present Chief Justice is concerned, he was concluding his work as an arbitrator at the time he was appointed to the Chief Justiceship, and I think he completely finished it before he was sworn in. Now, as to the relation of the former Chief Justice to some employment outside of his court, I can not speak definitely, because I have not the facts, but if the facts are as I have understood, Chief Justice White was engaged in the discharge of a great public duty.

Mr. MANN. I think so.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. His service was not in the discharge of a private duty. I should not object at all to have the point raised by my friend covered by a change in the amendment, so as to prevent a judge from engaging systematically in private business. I do not think that is proper. I do not think public sentiment approves it.

Mr. MANN. Judge Alschuler, of our city, is a very able judge, and for a year or more he acted frequently with reference to wages and working conditions between the packers of Chicago and the packers' employees, and performed a great public service.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I do not know whether he was paid for that or not.

Mr. MANN. I do not know either.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I do not believe he was.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman desire to prevent anything of that sort, or does he criticize it?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I will go very far to prevent judges turning away from their judicial work to engage in any other work. I am willing to take the chance of perhaps preventing a judge from doing something in some particular instance that might be beneficial. I think the important thing is to preserve the dignity as well as the integrity of the judiciary, and put it as far as possible beyond criticism or suspicion.

Mr. MANN. Well, if there is any man in this world who as a judge is beyond suspicion of favoritism it is Judge Landis.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I have not mentioned Judge Landis.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. In what I say I am not afraid to get at brass tacks.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I likewise have no fear; and since the gentleman has mentioned Judge Landis, I agree with the American Bar Association in believing that that gentleman made a very great mistake in contracting with the baseball interests of the country and receiving a salary to give a part of his time to certain duties that pertain to those interests. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman's amendment prevent a judge from accepting an appointment as executor under a will or being appointed an administrator of an estate?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes; I think it would. I can conceive that if a judge were to be permitted to do that he might allow the business coming to him as a fiduciary to take the greater part of his time, because some estates are very large, and they are just the kind of estates which, if any, would be intrusted to a judge.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. MONTAGUE. Before that I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] five minutes additional time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I simply wanted to say this, without attempting to inflict any details upon the committee, that apparently this legislation proceeds upon the theory that there is an extraordinary amount of work in certain of the districts at this time, which calls for the appointment of a large number of additional judges. The bill, as the gentleman in charge [Mr. WALSH] has stated, among its major propositions, provides for judges of certain districts being designated to sit in other districts. The bill is made up on statistics that are summarized in the report of the hearings that were had before the House committee. Those statistics undoubtedly show that there is a very large amount of business in certain of the districts, and, as I understand, it is inferred from that showing that these additional judges are to be appointed. Now, I submit that just as clear an inference from those statistics is this, that the excess business in every one of the districts where it exists can easily be taken care of by judges who are not now unduly burdened with work. If the statistics are of any value, there will be no difficulty, in the event that the designation and allotment provisions of the bill are adopted, in having the business in Massachusetts, for example, taken care of by the judges belonging to other New England districts. There will be no difficulty in having the business in New York taken care of by the judges in certain districts in New York where there is not a very large business and by the New England judges; and these cases are illustrative of the general situation.

I submit to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] that such being the situation, he ought to go no further at this time than to insure that the judges now in office perform the judicial work of the country, without confining themselves to the districts to which they are immediately attached. All of the so-called congestion can be taken care of satisfactorily in that manner, and if that be done there will be no need to appoint more than 20 judges at once, with a prospect of a great many more judges being appointed in the near future. My friend has referred to individual bills that are pending that may be passed. If the matter is handled without creating new judges now, the Committee on the Judiciary will have ample opportunity to make the sort of investigation that my friend from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] thinks ought to be made, and reach a reliable conclusion as to whether or not in this or that district a new judge ought to be appointed. I think it is premature to go further at this time.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I do not know whether the gentleman understands, but I think possibly he may not, from what he said, that all the individual bills pending and upon which action has been had are included in this measure.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Reading the testimony of the Attorney General, I can not escape thinking that it is the belief of the Attorney General that even though you may provide for the number of judges mentioned in this bill, nevertheless the appointment of still other judges will be hereafter sought. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has again expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, during the time that I was chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary I had occasion to look very carefully into our legislation as to judges and courts, and I may say in opening that I sympathize very heartily with the practice now adopted by the committee of bringing in a single bill and considering all the wants of all the districts of the United States and making comparison between them, instead of leaving that comparison to be made by individual Members of the House when a bill is brought in for a particular State or district. This is far the better way, because the matter has to be considered as a whole in order to find out which district really needs relief.

I may say also—and I risk my time a little in doing it—that I have always been very much impressed with the plan adopted in the old country of England, where they do not make more judges in order to get rid of an accumulation or flood of business in any particular circuit, but assign members of the bar, barristers and sergeants, by temporary appointment as commissioners, not to be judges but simply to try the cases. They are called commissioners of assize and nisi prius. They sit in assize for criminal cases. They sit in nisi prius for civil cases. They have no power, however, to act as judges, except merely to conduct the trial, for their report is made to the judge and they act wholly under his direction, and the judgment is signed by the judge.

Probably it was not intended by the Constitution of the United States to insist that there should be no such officers, or that they should be called judges and hold for life. The English practice is a practical, sensible way of relieving any accumulation of business within a particular district.

They have also in England a plan which is used in New Jersey, that a court of equity has a right to refer a whole case to the master of the rolls, or to a master in chancery to hear the case for the chancellor and to advise the court by his opinion what order or decree should be made thereon. I am sorry to say that in a carefully considered case in the Supreme Court of the United States it has been held that that practice can not be followed in our Federal courts except by consent, and that the whole case can not be referred for that purpose, but only a part of the case.

A complete reference can be made by consent, but the courts of this country would have great relief in the trial of long equity cases if they could select some counselor or attorney who was really acquainted with equity law to hear the case and advise the court on the decree. It would always be done practically by consent and would expedite business. So much for that. We are not following that practice of enabling the present judges to do the work. We are appointing 22 new judges when we already have 105. That makes 127 judges altogether. We have a population of a little over 105,000,000, according to this report, and the result is that there is one judge for every 800,000 of the population. I am free to say that I consider that apportionment by population is on the whole almost the best plan. The number of cases pending tells mighty little. They may be cases that have been on the calendar for a long while. They may be, as in the case of part of the criminal cases in my own State, a lot of draft cases, 10,000 of them, that may never come to trial. They may be little customs cases that go through very quickly; they may be small cases at law. We do not bring them in the Federal courts in New Jersey, because we can try them better in our counties, and we have courts that we trust. Only the big cases go to the United States courts. We have in New Jersey 9 supreme court justices and about 20 circuit court judges. The supreme court sits in Trenton. We have a chancellor and 10 vice chancellors, and the supreme court justices, the chancellor, and the vice chancellors all get salaries above $10,000. They are taken from our best lawyers, and do justice with might and main from end to end of the year, and less cases therefore go into the United States courts. Nevertheless, in my State of New Jersey, in spite of the fact that we have three United States judges, it is less than our proportion to our 3,155,000 population, that at 800,000 population for each judge would entitle us to four judges. These three judges are overwhelmed with business. We have a large admiralty practice, not so large as New York, but large. We have besides that a wise system of law that has induced people very largely to incorporate in the State of New Jersey, because they trust our courts, and as a result our United States court is swamped with business brought to us for the adjustment of enormous business matters, largely suits in equity that take day after day to try, because they must be tried by the court. I have investigated in the Attorney General's report for 1920 the work done by these courts in New Jersey, which is far ahead of that by the Federal judges in other States in disposing of business; but, nevertheless, they have hardly been able to hold an equity circuit with any one of the three judges for a whole year. They have been overwhelmed with the criminal business, which takes precedence.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Will the gentleman yield? Will it interrupt the gentleman if I ask him a question?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Not at all.

Mr. MACGREGOR. I have a recollection that we have more judges in the State of New York than they have in the whole of England. I looked that up when I was in the Legislature of New York. Has the gentleman made any study of that proposition?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I have already said that the judges in England get rid of their business in two ways: One is by referring the law business for trial to commissioners, and the second method is by referring the equity business for trial to masters in chancery. We try to do the same thing in New Jersey in our State practice, and I believe it is the right way.

In the United States district court system there are two ways of dealing with a State: One is to divide it into small districts and make people go to various small towns in the State to try cases and to search records and to file papers, thus multiplying clerks, marshals, and officers of all sorts. In New Jersey we have followed the other plan. With a population large enough for four judges, at 800,000 people apiece, and with more than the business for that number, New Jersey has followed the plan of having but one district court. As a result, the three judges have their central office at the capital of the State. The records are kept there, and the judges are assigned their business and are all kept at work by the presiding judge. There is no danger of idleness anywhere, because each judge is given his work to do and the work is apportioned. There is less danger also of the selection of a friendly court or of conflicting injunctions, and all the horrors that come when one judge at one place takes hold of a matter and another judge at another place takes hold of the same matter and there is no central control over them all. Our district court is one court, and we get one decision in the courts of equity where they say equity varies with the discretion of the chancellor. We have but one court, and that is right. It has but one clerk and one marshal. There is no waste of money. It is the right way; and we have at the head of that court a senior judge of the district who is renowned all over the United States for the strength of his opinions, and he is assisted now by two young and earnest fellow judges. Yet they are away behind. I could turn to the Attorney General's report of 1921, if we had it, to see if they have done their work. During the previous year, taking such things as equity cases and admiralty cases, besides a very large amount of criminal business, there were begun in New Jersey, in 1920, 232 such cases and 183 disposed of—that is, of cases other than admiralty. Of admiralty and other cases than bankruptcy there were 295 cases begun and 352 disposed of, more than one case for each working day, of these heavy equity and admiralty cases which are not small things. It shows the pressure on the court of which I have spoken.

We may make a short comparison of the 22 districts in which new judges are provided. In the first place, with respect to population, I have already said that with 3,155,354 people we are entitled to four judges instead of three, and we ought to have one more; we need him. We will not really waste any money because we do not waste it on clerks' or marshals' salaries. It is paid only to the judge. There is only one clerk and one marshal.

As to cases pending, the report shows that there were 331 civil cases pending, and that is a larger number than is pending in any district except the southern district of New York, and usually twice or three times the number pending. With respect to criminal cases, there are 11,502 pending in New Jersey, more than in any other district whatever. We did go after the draft men, when other States failed to do so, and half of that is due to that fact. In admiralty cases we had 178 pending. That is more than any other district, except New York, the same number in the eastern district of Pennsylvania and in northern California. We have in bankruptcy 934 cases pending. Only 6 of the 22 districts named in this bill have more. Sixteen have less. We have in other cases than bankruptcy 482 cases pending. Only 7 of the 22 have more. We have a total of 13,667 cases pending, more than all of the other districts named, except southern New York.

I maintain that on that showing New Jersey has need for another judge to clear up arrears. I can not find out what cases were begun in 1921 because I have only the report of 1920, and I desire leave of the committee when I can get that report, if I can, to print a statement or to append it to my remarks, for I want to print my remarks to-day.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Is the gentleman referring to the number of cases begun in New Jersey in 1920?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. In New Jersey and in other States. I want to compare it.

Mr. WALSH. I have the number here for New Jersey.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes; but we can not compare that with the others, and it is not fair to give a number without giving a comparison.

Mr. Chairman, every member of the bar in New Jersey will tell you that our United States court judges are worked to death at the present time, and that it is impossible for them to transact the amount of business that has come in. The number of cases begun and ended in a single year, of course, does not tell the size and character of the cases, nor tell as much as I can tell as a member of the bar, which is that New Jersey absolutely needs this relief, and that according to population and the number of cases pending there she is entitled to relief.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. What hours in each day do the courts in the gentleman's State sit?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. We sit from 10 o'clock until 4 or 5.

Mr. MICHENER. With what recess?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Almost none. Half an hour.

Mr. MICHENER. Half an hour at noon?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. How many days in the week?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Every day, I believe.

Mr. MICHENER. And how much vacation do the judges take each year?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. That I can not answer, but it is quite small.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman says that the number of cases on the calender does not always tell the story.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. No; nor the number of cases begun and ended.

Mr. MICHENER. Does the gentleman not think that the number of hours per day and the days in the year that the judges work are really the determining factors?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes and no. We have judges there who really dispose of the business. They get through with business which is before them, and they do not waste any time. The way cases move along there in the United States courts is something that is worth looking at.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman state in his remarks the number of hours per day that the judges in his State sit, and the days per year and the amount of time they take for vacation?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The gentleman would have to inquire of the courts in New Jersey as to that. I know that they work as hard as any men can work, and that is all that I can say.

I yield back the remainder of my time, with many thanks for the accommodation given me.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein one or two statistical tables that I have prepared, and a letter to which I referred in my remarks upon the bill, and also one or two other communications touching upon legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting various tables and letters. Is there objection?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, what is the letter to which the gentleman refers?

Mr. WALSH. I referred to a letter during the course of my remarks, addressed to Judge MOORE, of Virginia, by the United States judge for the eastern district of Virginia, stating in substance that there was no necessity for an additional judge there, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] furnished me with the letter and said that he had no objections to its being made public.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I renew my request to insert along with my remarks, or as an extension separately, a comparative statement with reference to cases begun and ended, abbreviated as much as possible.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting the statement indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE].

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, the process or method of determining the number of judges provided for in the bill under consideration would secure an additional judge for the eastern district of Virginia. Indeed, upon this process or basis of consideration such an additional judge was prescribed in the original bill, and this is logical, for the statistics relied upon to give judges to other districts would have given an additional judge to the eastern district of Virginia. But I would not have supported the bill had such a provision remained in it, nor will I now support it with that provision eliminated. I simply mention the instance in my own district to stress the contradictory facts resulting from an identical system of statistics in order to observe that the judge of the eastern district of Virginia does not think that that district needs an additional member of the bench, and to suggest that if the truth could be obtained as to other districts many of them would not be saddled with the additional judges by this measure.

The question of the number of new judges does not determine my attitude upon this particular measure, but it is the unwise, unsafe, and untrustworthy method of determining the number of new judges, and the consequent inevitably faulty distribution of these judges that constrains me to oppose this bill. The statistical method of determining congested dockets and the accumulated and undisposed of litigation is not a sound or safe method to be employed.

It is obvious that the sole factor to be considered is the nature and character of the cases and the nature and character of the judges. We must know this before making new judges, and this is precisely what we do not know, but we do know that little or no effort has been made to gain this essential information. The records before us and the records in the Judiciary Committee give no satisfactory explanation of the evasion of this fundamental inquiry. There is a faint glimpse of appreciation of this omission by the reported division of cases into criminal, admiralty, and bankruptcy, and this is, indeed, a faint and dim glimpse, but even with these divisional statistics I submit that they are wholly untrustworthy and misleading. Perhaps, as the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] stated, if statistics are taken at all as a basis, the most satisfactory statistics are those relating to population.

I have no doubt that some additional judges are needed, but how many and where must they come from? A great deal of business that may be determined exigent is of a more or less passing character or nature, cases, for example, growing out of the war, which will hardly afford a permanent source of litigation. The prohibition question, for example, has given rise to a good many cases, but they require no great or serious thought by the judges. The bulk of this class of cases can be disposed of easily and expeditiously. So, with internal-revenue cases, most of them can likewise be rapidly disposed of by any ordinary judge. I was United States attorney for four years, and sometimes 20 or 30 cases a day were tried or finally disposed of for the violation of the internal-revenue law.

If there is real need for these judges, I am inclined to think, with all respect to my associates of the Judiciary Committee, that the Senate bill is preferable if a reduction of the number therein contained is accomplished. To attack this problem of congested dockets in a practical way, perhaps it is best to have a flying squadron of judges, but let that flying squadron be less in number, aye, half of the number, found in this bill. Why, under the condition of the finances of America, should we have 22 judges, I can not conceive, and the jaded public will not approve.

Again—and I do not desire to be a monitor when I make this statement—the judiciary, more than any other of the three departments of our Government, determines the general confidence of the people in the institutions of the American system, and upon a mere basis of flimsy and inapplicable statistics to burden the tax-ridden people with 22 additional judges will not tend to increase the confidence of the American people in the efficiency of the American courts.

I beg the Members of the House to lay fully out of view all partisan and personal considerations in dealing with so grave a subject. I beg them to consider not only the necessity of new judges but the financial conditions of this country as well, and that we may not undertake in this way, by some sort of mathematical enumeration and apportionment, to spread 22 judges throughout this country. I admit that there are judges needed in Massachusetts. I would very gladly vote for one, and not seriously object to two, for that State. The district of New York, a large district, seems to be quite congested in its docket, but we know nothing of the ability, industry, and temperament of the judges now presiding in those districts, and statistics can not solve this personal equation. Are they industrious? Are they efficient? What proof do the hearings supply upon this vital point?

Have we had the opinions of the judges from these so-called congested districts in the committee hearings? Perhaps one or two judges have appeared before the Attorney General. We seem not only not to have the requisite evidence, but to have avoided securing it.

The judge from the eastern district of Virginia has been upon the bench a short time. He succeeded a gentleman of most laborious temperament, who has recently been elevated to the circuit court of appeals. Both of them tell me that there is no need of an additional judge for this district. But if statistics of congestion are relied upon, as they seem to be relied upon, other districts will secure judges with as little or less support or reason than the eastern district of Virginia, where confessedly no additional judge is needed. I submit that if the same proof is wrong in one instance it may be faulty in another, and that we should go slowly and cautiously in multiplying judges upon a basis so impracticable and precarious.

Mr. Chairman, I am compelled to leave town in a few moments, but I did not wish to do so without expressing my opinion, however hurriedly and inadequately, upon this bill. I will offer the suggestion that the Senate bill is a better measure if you reduce the judges to 9 or 10. Try it out and see how it works. Congress is in session and is likely to be in session for a good while to come. There are judges in some of the circuits who, by reason of physical infirmities and decrepitude, are unable to perform their duties. These districts need some assistance. Bills in such cases have come before the House, and they have been scrutinized with very great care, and in many instances rejected by this House. So I declare to you that statistics or generalizations from them will not support the character of legislation now contended for, and that in the absence of full proof upon so grave and serious a matter you should not shock—and I use the language rather conservatively—the public conscience of the American people by increasing the judges from 105 to 127 in a few hours of debate. Beware of impairing or imperiling the American judiciary. Lift it above partisan consideration. We should look more for justice and less for judges. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] yields five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER].

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I shall support the bill as reported by the committee. I want, however, to say that it was the understanding in the State of Kansas among the lawyers at the time this bill was being considered by the Judiciary Committee that the Senate bill providing for 18 judges, according to the circuits, was to be the legislation, and the bar association of my State have adopted a resolution and I think will present to the Senate committee the claim that Kansas should have an extra judge for our district. I would not offer that as an amendment here, because I think it is a matter that should be handled in the regular way by the committee and upon a showing made.

I want to take the time allotted to me to address the House upon a different subject for a few moments.

I suppose I have the company of all of the other Members of Congress in my amazement at the attack made upon Congress by the Secretary of War. Concerning that portion of the Secretary of War's speech in which he criticizes our rules, and so forth, and objects to the independence of the House, I shall not enter into any discussion; but there are portions of his published address which amount not only to an attack upon Congress but to an attack upon the President as well, and I desire to call attention to it.

The Secretary is quoted as having said:

> I shall not take the time to criticize the legislation Congress has enacted for the benefit of the farmer. It was brought about by a combination of members of the two great political parties which had sufficient votes to obtain the result desired. * * *

That portion of the Secretary's speech means, I take it, that time alone prevents his denouncing all the legislation that has been enacted by this Congress for the benefit of the farmer. Then he does take time to be specific on the legislation, I suppose, that is closest to his heart, and he says:

> One of the least excusable of the laws passed, it seems to me, was that increasing the interest rate on farm loan bank bonds to 5½ per cent and leaving the rate to the farm borrower the same as it had been. Under the present law, as I see it, the Government is financing the farmer and is producing a vast volume of nontaxable securities, so that, in effect, the farmer is borrowing his money at a much lower rate than the current market warrants.

I desire to call the attention of the country to the fact that the President of the United States has signed all of the legislation that has been passed by this Congress, so that Mr. Weeks's criticism applies to the Executive as well as to the legislative branch of the Government. Too bad, indeed, if the farm loan banks and joint-stock land banks are permitted to sell their bonds at 5½ per cent interest but are not permitted to raise the rate of interest to the farmer. This statement on the part of the Secretary of War amounts to a statement that the farmer is enjoying too low a rate of interest, is being discriminated for; and in this regard I just want to leave the thought that the Secretary of War is not familiar with the situation and conditions in the agricultural sections, or he would not say that. I venture the assertion that the gentleman stands absolutely alone in the claim that there is an unjust discrimination on the part of Congress in favor of the farmer.

Of course, the Members of the House know the trouble with the Secretary of War. We reduced the Army to 150,000, and in that same bill, reducing the size of the Army, forced reforms in the expenditure of money in the War Department. I am informed and believe that the Secretary of War was the cause of the President of the United States writing Congress the letter in which we were informed that while the President had not vetoed the bill it was unworkable, and that we would in all human probability be called upon to appropriate money to make good moral obligations that we would be under to soldiers that enlisted for a fixed period and that they had had to discharge over their protests. I said at the time that the President was misinformed; that it was all right to write us the letter; that we would respect his views should there be a moral obligation. Suppose the President had followed the advice of the Secretary of War and vetoed that bill; then we would never have known how unsound the position of the Secretary was on this question. Now, we all know that the Army was reduced away before the time contemplated by the legislation, that there are no moral obligations, because they had to quit discharging soldiers upon their own requests, or there would not have been any Army left by this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for three minutes more.

Mr. TINCHER. But let us just contemplate for a moment how much credit Congress gets for this. I have seen a number of articles in the newspapers about how much money the War Department was saving. Why not be fair, Mr. War Department, and admit the saving of the money you have saved was forced upon you by this House of Congress? And why harbor any grudge about it and keep "picking" at Congress?

In your speech you say that to permit the land banks to sell their bonds at 5½ per cent but not to permit them to loan the money to the farmer for any more than they were before is inexcusable. The land banks are making money, can and will make money, on this margin. I would suggest that the Secretary of War read the President's message, and he will find that he agrees with the House of Representatives, that there are too many middlemen living off the farmer and consumer; that our marketing system of our products is imperfect in this regard; and that that same thing could be said of the marketing system of our loans. I think a broker is probably a necessary evil to some extent, but this is no time for Cabinet officers to worry because there is not enough margin between what the farmer pays for his loan and what the bond sells for.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. I can not yield; I have not the time. I will yield if the gentleman will allow me to finish. I am going to talk about you in a few minutes anyway. [Laughter.]

Mr. LUCE. Very well.

Mr. TINCHER. I may some day be called upon to apologize for my Republicanism; I belong to no "bloc"; it is not necessary to belong to a "bloc" in the House of Representatives under present conditions to get fair legislation. I have never used any adjectives to describe my Republicanism. If occasion ever requires that I make apologies for my party loyalty, I will not begin making these apologies to a Massachusetts Republican under existing conditions. [Applause.] Early in this Congress those of us who believed in a protective tariff were trying to pass that kind of a bill in the House of Representatives, but we ran against a "bloc" on the subject of a tariff on hides. The New England Republicans combined with the southern Democrats, and on a roll call defeated a clear majority of the Republican Members of the House, and left hides, so far as the House bill was concerned, on the free list at a time when a hide was selling at from 1 cent to 1½ cents a pound, the cheapest in a quarter of a century, at a time when the New England shoe manufacturer was selling his shoes at the highest peacetime price in a quarter of a century. Then, Mr. Secretary, before you find too much fault with these laws that have been passed to try to encourage agriculture, and the party regularity, as you term it, look up the record and you will find that the only Republican conference we have had this year to decide a question was bolted by the New England Republicans to such an extent that by combining with the Democrats they were able to defeat a majority of the Republican Members of Congress. [Applause.]

I know, Mr. Secretary, that it is popular when up in New York, making a speech, to condemn the American farmer in a roundabout way, and it is generally popular anywhere to condemn the American Congress. It has been a popular pastime for a good many years, but your criticism goes further and amounts to a good, sound rebuke for the President, who has not only signed all this legislation and refused to veto any bills, even at the request of any Cabinet member, but who, on last Tuesday, delivered a message to Congress which should be read—nay, even more than read, committed to memory—by members of the Cabinet before making any more New York speeches. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I was a delegate to the 1916 Republican convention at Chicago. After looking over the field of candidates carefully, I cast my vote from start to finish for Charles Evans Hughes. As yet, I have no apologies to offer for that vote. [Applause.]

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. TINCHER. I will yield to the gentleman if I have time.

Mr. LUCE. Can the gentleman inform the House as to the rate at which the last issue of farm loan bonds was put on the market?

Mr. TINCHER. I do not know. You mean from the Federal farm loan bank?

Mr. LUCE. I mean the last issue of farm loan bonds.

Mr. TINCHER. You may call it the farm loan bank or the joint-stock bank. But I say this: That the American farmer needs every penny of advantage that he is getting to-day from the farm loan bank or the joint-stock bank, and no Member dare go on record as advocating the repeal of that legislation. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has again expired. If no one else cares to participate in the general debate the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDLIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not care at this time to discuss the pending bill. That bill has already been thoroughly discussed, and will be further discussed by those who follow me.

I resolved not to take up the time of this body unless I had a matter to bring to its attention in which I thought the membership might have some interest or one in which I was vitally interested.

When Postmaster General Hays put the marines on the trains in this country in order to guard the mail, I doubted very much the wisdom of that order then issued by him to these marines, to shoot to kill. Since that time I am convinced that the order that he issued should not have been issued. In the view that I hold I am joined by one high in authority from one of the Middle Western States, a gentleman of the same political faith as the Postmaster General. In connection with my remarks I desire to read what he has to say upon this subject. I read:

[By the Associated Press.]

MADISON, WIS., December 8.

Gov. J. J. Blaine in a letter to-day to Will H. Hays, Postmaster General, attacked the Postal Department's policy of maintaining armed marine guards on mail trains, with the instruction to shoot to kill when necessities of the case require.

"When the necessities of the case require." Who is to decide? Of course, the marine himself. I read further:

The governor also asked that M. M. Hanson, the guard who shot Otto Lambrecht, of Kaukauna, Wis., be returned to Wisconsin for trial.

Gov. Blaine's letter is in reply to that of the Postmaster General, who answered the governor's request for surrender of the guard, with a statement defending his action and expressing the intention of the Government to continue the use of marines to guard mail trains.

The governor says this:

"If the rule set down by you is to obtain by the Federal Government, then there isn't any reason," Gov. Blaine said, "why any department of the Federal Government can not set up a military régime over the people of this country, the result of which will be that innocent men will be shot down like so many rats, according to the whim, caprice, inefficiency, inexperience, misjudgment, or even willfulness of the guard.

"However, the only purpose I have in the matter," he added, "is to see that the laws of the State of Wisconsin are enforced, and I therefore asume that the Federal Government will be very willing to permit the guard who did the shooting to be returned to Wisconsin for trial."

This morning I received in my mail from my district a letter from a gentleman who is mature in years, is a man of conservative judgment, a man who I know would not make a statement unless he had the facts to back it up. It is relative to a case that happened near Shreveport, La. Perhaps some other Members of the House have already read an account of it in the press. This gentleman writes me that a young farmer's lad was standing at a depot at a small village, Blanchard, in the parish of Caddo, waiting for a train to pass, as boys are wont to do; in fact, grown people gather around a depot to see the trains pass. This boy was standing there, and a mail guard told him, as reported to me, to move away from the train. The boy replied that he was not afraid of the marine's gun; but he moved, and moved back, stepped back to the edge of the platform, and was obeying the demand of the marine; but, like every red-blooded American, conscious of the fact that he had committed no offense, conscious of the fact that he had violated no law of the country himself, and while obeying the order had the manhood to tell this marine that he was not afraid of his gun.

Now, Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, I realize that perhaps it will do little good for an humble Member of this great body to call the attention of the country to this state of affairs, but if some one who had more influence with the Postmaster General——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SANDLIN. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What happened? The gentleman said the man simply stepped back.

Mr. SANDLIN. I am glad the gentleman called my attention to that. The statement says the boy was shot down like a dog, and was killed, and as the gentleman puts it in his letter, he was murdered. Those are the facts as they come to me. If that is true, it is a bad state of affairs and something ought to be done about it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SANDLIN. Gladly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Has the gentleman made any investigation or inquiry to determine by what authority of law the Postmaster General or the Secretary of the Navy are putting these 2,000 men on these trains?

Mr. SANDLIN. I have not, and I would be glad if somebody would obtain that information.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think the whole country would like to know by what authority it is done.

Mr. SANDLIN. And I should like to say that if he has that authority I think it is being grossly abused, and should be withdrawn from him.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back three minutes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I feel very sympathetic with the views of the Representatives of those sections of the country where there is a congestion of judicial business and a delay in obtaining the trial of cases in the courts. I do not know of anything more exasperating to suitors or to attorneys than to have term after term and year after year pass without having their legitimate business disposed of by the courts appointed for that purpose. A delay in the administration of the law is often a denial of justice, and a congested docket is often taken advantage of by evilly disposed persons to escape just liabilities. I will vote for any measure that I think will give relief to the people of congested districts. But it does seem to me that this bill before this body is of a very makeshift character. It affords a premium for judicial inefficiency. If it gives the relief to the congested districts that they are entitled to, it will do so by an alleged temporary legislation and by encumbering other districts with judges for whom they can have no use. It is hard to understand the present distribution of judges amongst the several States as exists by present law. Take, for instance, the State of Florida, that is represented on this floor by four Representatives. It has already two district judges. Take Massachusetts, represented on this floor by 16 Congressmen. That State has but one district judge. Take Indiana, a large western State, with large commercial interests. It has but one district judge. Alabama, another State more agricultural than commercial, has three district judges. The whole of New England has but six judges and Texas alone has six. Maryland, a great commercial State, has one, Ohio four, Tennessee two, Oklahoma two, Arkansas two, Nebraska two, Florida two.

Even the tables in the hearings do not justify the present distribution. Massachusetts has 6,834 cases on the court docket undisposed of and only one judge, New Jersey has three judges and 13,567 cases undisposed of, Florida has two judges and 1,990 cases on its docket. Whether we make the standard population or congested docket, the grossest inequality is disclosed.

Nothing, however, can be a worse guide than a congested docket. It is as often due to inefficient judges as to volume of business. Alabama has three judges and a 4,500 docket. The great commercial State of Maryland has one judge and a 372 docket. It has already been pointed out that in one alleged congested district the judge is receiving a $50,000 salary from organized baseball.

The present bill proposes only temporary relief. Judges are appointed in certain favored localities, but vacancies are not to be filed unless they occur within four years; then a permanent appointment may be made at the mere caprice of the Attorney General and a judge. But the appointments are for the lifetime of the judge. This may not cover a sufficient period or it may extend far beyond the necessity.

Without regard to costs, where a necessity exists for the proper transaction of public business, a court should be provided, not a judge to take charge of a temporary emergency. The judge may not live long enough to effectuate the relief or he may long survive the necessity, a useless burden on the Public Treasury.

Furthermore, the present bill simply accentuates the present inequalities of distribution. Florida, with only four Congressmen, has already two judges and is given an extra one, while Maryland, with six Congressmen and a great commercial center, continues with only one. Indiana, with thirteen Congressmen, has only one judge, but Arizona, with one Congressman and one judge, is given an extra one. Alabama has three judges, and——

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman tell the House whether there is three times as much business in the Federal courts in the State of Alabama as there is in the State of Indiana?

Mr. HARRISON. How could there be? What is there in Alabama that entitles that State to three district judges as against one in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts?

Mr. MANN. How long has Alabama had three judges?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know how long she has had them.

Mr. MANN. Alabama has had three districts, but until very recently at least one judge was appointed for two districts.

Mr. HARRISON. Now, take Tennessee. What is there in Tennessee that should give her any advantage over the State of Indiana? You propose to give a new judge to Tennessee, making it a State with three judges, as against Indiana that has only one.

Mr. MANN. Alabama, as I recall, has no special judge for the middle district. The judge for the southern district acts as judge for the middle district. I believe there are two judges for the northern district. How long that has been I do not know, but my recollection is that the bill was passed on the very urgent representation of the district that the business of Birmingham and other places was so great as to require that additional judge.

Mr. HARRISON. Alabama has three judges, and if Alabama could obtain its relief by a special bill for that purpose after due consideration of its interests, why can not Massachusetts get the relief it is entitled to in the same manner? It seems to me that is the proper method to pursue. It looks to me like we were making a bargain, a deal, "If you will give me an extra judge down here, we will give you what judges you are entitled to up there."

Mr. MANN. I hope that is not the case. The gentleman knows that in recent years, instead of trying to pass separate bills which would require practically the same length of time, and which are only passed by unanimous consent, the general policy of the House has been to pass an omnibus bill. They need an additional judge in Massachusetts.

Mr. HARRISON. If we are to have an omnibus bill, let us have a bill that is of a permanent character, that will give the permanent relief to which the country is entitled, and not have a bill here that is a pure makeshift.

Mr. MANN. That part of the gentleman's argument I do not understand.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. With respect to how temporary this is—and it is proposed to be a temporary bill—I ask the gentleman if it does not largely depend upon the life of the man who happens to be appointed?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. In other words, if he dies within four years, his successor may or may not be appointed; but if he lives for 15 years he will continue as a judge whether he is needed or not.

Mr. HARRISON. Not only that, but the district judges who are appointed for the temporary purpose of taking care of this business can be converted into permanent judges by the certificate of the Attorney General and a judge. I have not time, but I could show a large number of the most peculiar distributions of these judges, and the peculiar distribution not only perpetuated in this bill but greatly accentuated. There is no difficulty in meeting the requirements of the country by a well-considered omnibus bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. HUDSPETH. How about Montana?

Mr. HARRISON. There is one Congressman and two judges in Montana and Arizona has one Congressman but two judges. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CLOUSE].

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, of course I could not begin to say in the five minutes granted me just what I would like to say in respect to this measure, but I do want to say that at this time I desire to compliment the Committee of this House upon bringing in for our consideration a bill of this character, a bill that I have no doubt has received the most serious consideration at the hands of each member of the committee. They have brought in a bill which the condition in the courts of the various districts of this country demand, and the legislation should be granted immediately. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON], my very good friend, wanted to know what there is in Tennessee to justify the creation of a new district. The gentleman overlooked the fact that Congress many years ago saw the necessity of an additional judge in Tennessee and created the district, but imposed the duties and obligations of holding court in that district upon the then existing judge for the extreme eastern district of Tennessee. We have in Tennessee, or did have on June 30 last, in the middle district of Tennessee, 1,494 cases pending on the docket. They are not cases that can be tried at the rate of 30 a day. I recall in the Nashville court a case that was recently tried involving the theft of millions of dollars worth of platinum from the Jacksonville powder plant, which extended over a period of five weeks, and there are yet three other defendants to be tried. That is but one case. I could enumerate not one, but dozens—yes, hundreds of cases in the middle district of Tennessee that will require days and weeks to try; and yet we are supposed to think that one judge can try 1,494 cases and clear the docket in that district! Besides, that judge has another district in which there were pending on the 30th day of last June 616 cases.

I am going to support this bill, because as a lawyer I know that in Tennessee the bill is needed, and I know from the careful investigation that the committee has given these other districts that the same necessity exists elsewhere.

There is another thing that I want to talk about, and that is this: In connection with the district courts, the United States to-day is paying out of the Treasury of the United States multiplied millions of dollars annually for keeping and detaining and confining prisoners who are charged with misdemeanors. You convict them and sentence them to 60 days or to 6 months imprisonment, and what do you do? You take the money from the Federal Treasury and you pay it to a jailer in some county. What ought we to do? I introduced a bill early in the extraordinary session providing that the Government maintain its own institutions for detaining its prisoners, and work them, not in competition with public labor but in producing the essential things of this Government, letting them in that way, in a measure at least, be self-sustaining. I wanted to call attention to this, because I hope one of these days at a very early time we are going to get consideration of that bill, and be here asking that, instead of throwing the money of the people of America away, we make these prisoners self-sustaining in an American institution where they can be confined and kept at labor rather than be confined in a county jail in idleness at an expense of from 75 cents to $1.15 per day for board. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. SWANK].

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Chairman, nothing deters the criminal more and has a greater effect for the good of society than a quick and vigorous enforcement of the laws of the land. While the Constitution of the United States and the different States provide that the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy trial, this prompt action is not what the criminal wants, unless he is unable to make bond. If we are to have the criminal laws properly administered we must provide the proper machinery for that purpose. Delay in the trial of criminal cases usually benefits the person charged. With delay and continuances in court on account of a lack of judges to try the cases, crime will increase and the rights of the law-abiding people will thereby further be endangered. Violations of the liquor law and other criminal cases should be reasonably hastened for trial or it may be impossible to try them at all. There never was a time when there was a greater need for a strict enforcement of the law than now. A defendant should be given his constitutional right to a speedy and impartial trial; it makes no difference what the charge may be, how small the offense charged, nor how great, he is entitled to this under our wise and wholesome laws. This is not only for the benefit of the person charged, but for the good of the public as well. Litigants in civil cases also have the right to have their cases heard within a reasonable time with as little delay as possible. The courts of the country are instituted to settle difficulties among our citizens when they are unable to agree out of court and they should be established at convenient and easily accessible places. The people pay the expenses of the courts, as they do the other necessary expenses of government, and should be protected. A person may have a good cause of action when he files his suit, but a few months delay may ruin his case and deprive him of that to which he is justly entitled. A proper respect for the law is fostered by having it speedily, economically, and impartially administered. There is no body of men who can cause this respect more than the judges themselves. A judge should have time to investigate thoroughly all cases before him, without undue haste, that full and complete justice may be done. Some may say that if the judges will work they can keep up with their dockets. I know that in some districts one judge can not try the cases, and two will be kept busy with the work of the court. I believe in judges working the same as other public officials should do, and when one of them loafs on the job and does not earn his salary he should be removed, but there is no use in talking about a man doing something that can not be done. I was district judge for six years preceding my election to the Sixty-seventh Congress, and with four counties in the judicial district I found plenty to do, and did not only hold court in the daytime but at night as well. You know that much of a judge's work is outside the court room, in the preparation of instructions, reading briefs, and preparing opinions. Of course, it is largely a matter with the individual judge, but they all can not be gauged in their work by one who may loaf on the job.

On the 18th day of May this year I introduced H. R. 6317, providing for an additional judge for the eastern district of Oklahoma. On the 22d day of July we had a hearing on this bill before the subcommittee, and the additional judge for which I asked is included in the bill now before us. Oklahoma is divided into two Federal court districts, with the Old Indian Territory comprising the eastern district and old Oklahoma Territory the western district. Only three counties of the congressional district which I have the honor to represent here in Congress are in the eastern district. I am familiar with the court business on the east side of the State as well as on the west side, having had three of the Indian Territory counties in my old judicial district. I believe all the judges provided for in this bill now before us are needed, and I know that another judge is greatly needed in the eastern district of my home State. In this district the Federal Government is a party to about 75 per cent of the cases filed.

Three tribal attorneys are employed by the Government, one each for the Choctaws, the Chickasaws, and the Creeks, and eight probate attorneys in addition. It is the duty of these attorneys to look after the affairs of certain members of the tribe in the State and Federal courts. The report of the clerk of this district shows that for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921, there were filed 1,055 criminal cases, 249 law cases, 78 equity cases, and 232 bankruptcy cases, or a total of 1,614 cases. Of course, outside judges may be sent in at times to help with the work, but this is not always satisfactory. In the trial of criminal cases the law is general, and judges from other districts can try this class of cases all right, but judges from other States will not understand the law governing the trial of cases affecting Indian lands, and the same will be true to a large extent with the trial of oil and gas cases. These cases make up the great majority of civil suits which are tried in this district. The same would be true in States having admiralty cases to try and causes peculiar to the great coal-producing States.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWANK. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HUDSPETH. In support of what my friend said, at one time I recall in my own State where the judge from the eastern district of Alabama was transferred to El Paso, and said that he knew nothing about the trial of Spanish land grants.

Mr. SWANK. I thank my friend for that statement. In the eastern district of Oklahoma outside judges held court 35 days in 1920 and 60 days in 1921. If it is shown that there is enough work to keep two judges busy in a district, in the interest of the public as well as the litigants the additional judge should be provided. I do not believe that it will cost the Government a penny more to have an additional judge in the eastern district of Oklahoma, for the reason that great expense will be saved where witnesses do not have to be subpœnaed and jurors summoned several times on account of continuances. Then more fines will be paid and more costs collected if the necessary court machinery is provided for the trial of the cases. There will be no additional district attorney, marshal, or clerk, and I do not believe that it will be necessary to add but few, if any, additional deputies.

Here I submit a statement from the clerk of the eastern district of Oklahoma showing the condition in this district, with a statement of fees collected and causes filed:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF CLERK UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT,
EASTERN DISTRICT OF OKLAHOMA,
Muskogee, Okla., June 16, 1921.

DEAR SIR: At the request of Hon. R. L. Williams, judge of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Oklahoma, I have compiled and herewith submit for your information certain data which have reference to the volume of business of this court.

You will find attached a comparative statement of the business of this court for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1919, and June 30, 1920.

Next attached will be found a statement of suits filed in this court during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921 (up to and including the 15th day of June, 1921).

Next will be found the earnings of this office for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1919, June 30, 1920, and June 30, 1921 (up to and including June 15, 1921).

Next will be found a summary of the famous 30,000 land suits and the disposition made of those suits.

For your information, will advise that prior to July 1, 1913, the record of the disposition of these suits was kept in the office of the Attorney General at Washington, D. C., and for that reason I am unable to advise you how many of these cases were disposed of each year by agreement, but if desired this information may be secured from the Attorney General.

In order that you may readily understand the data herewith submitted may I not presume to explain the same to you in order that you may promptly answer any questions that may be asked you?

Take the comparative statement first attached for the fiscal years 1919 and 1920.

You will note on the margin that the sum total of all cases closed in this court for the fiscal year 1919 was 2,896. This means there were 2,896 cases disposed of. However, this statement is misleading, for the reason that there were 2,010 land suits disposed of by agreement, none of which were tried. Now, when you deduct the 2,010 special land-suit cases from the 2,896 cases disposed of you have but 886 cases that really came before the court.

This same statement applies to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920. Total number of cases disposed of, as shown by the report, 1,690. However, of this number 603 were special land suits, and when you deduct these 603 special land suits you have 1,087 cases that actually came before the court. You will, therefore, see that instead of the business falling off, as claimed, the actual business disposed of increased from 886 cases during the fiscal year 1919 to 1,087 cases during the fiscal year 1920.

I regret that it will be impossible for me to get up our statistical report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and get the same to you for use between the 15th and 30th of this month, but I have gotten up and herewith submit all the information that is available at this time, and I will follow the same up with my statistical report at the earliest possible moment.

I call your attention to the fact that this preliminary report, herewith submitted, is taken off June 15, 1921, and does not include the present term of court at Hugo, now in session, with the exception of indictments found at the Hugo term.

From this report you will find that there have been 247 law, 78 equity, 232 bankruptcy, and 1,055 criminal cases filed in this court up to and including June 15, 1921, or a total of 1,612 cases filed.

To this number should be added the number of cases carried over from the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, or 1,607 cases, which would make a grand total of 3,219 cases on our books during the fiscal year of 1921. However, from this total of 3,219 cases should be deducted the 208 special land suits disposed of during the fiscal year 1921 by agreement, which would leave a net grand total of 3,011 to come before the court during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921.

The best indication of the increase in the volume of business in this court is by the increase in the earnings of the clerk's office, as shown by the table hereto attached:

1919	$16,754.56
1920	17,156.55
1921	17,670.73

I feel confident that there will be fully an additional $1,000 to add to the 1921 earnings.

Permit me to call your special attention to the disposition of the special land suits as shown by the last item on the statement hereto attached.

In 1915, 3,111 cases disposed of by agreement.

In 1916, 6,903 cases disposed of by agreement, and on down to 1921, when 208 were disposed of by agreement.

It occurs to me that if a fair estimate of the volume of work coming before this court is to be had, these special land suits that were settled by agreement should be deducted each year, in order to get an accurate estimate of the work actually performed by the court.

As shown by the statement, 7 and not to exceed 10 of these 30,000 special land suits were actually tried before the court, which would leave 29,865 disposed of by agreement and 125 yet undisposed of. Of these 125 cases, 75 are held up on account of dead defendants and other causes, and 50 account answers, so you can see that out of the 30,000 land suits only 10 of them have, and not to exceed 60 of them may, come before the court.

I feel sure that my statistical report will show that this court has disposed of fully 30 per cent more cases during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, than were disposed of during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, or in the neighborhood of 1,400 cases.

However, with this increase in cases disposed of we will carry over into the fiscal year of 1922 some 1,711 cases, not counting the cases filed between the 15th and 30th of June, 1921, or an increase of 434 cases. This increase does not include the land suits.

This would be enough to convince anyone that the volume of work in this court is not falling off.

Very respectfully, W. S. MCCLURE, Clerk.

W. M. MCCLURE, Clerk.

The committee report shows that on July 1, 1921, there were 156,601 cases pending in the United States district courts. Of this number 9,760 were civil, 55,769 criminal, 37,242 bankruptcy, 7,869 admiralty. The report shows that criminal business in the Federal district courts has increased over 800 per cent since 1912, and that a large portion of the increase the past two years is due to the national prohibition law. The narcotic law, espionage act, antismuggling law, Federal automobile theft law, violations of the income tax, and postal laws have also contributed to this increase. According to the report, of the criminal cases pending July 1, 1921, 10,365 were for violations of the Federal prohibition law, 6,558 internal revenue cases, 2,176 postal law cases, and 932 violations of the interstate commerce act. The average amount of fines and costs collected during the year ending June 30, 1921, was about $40,000 per judge—a much larger amount than it takes to run the courts. Therefore the enactment of this bill will not cause any additional tax levies for the expenses of the extra judges, but after paying all costs incident thereto, a large sum will be returned to the Treasury.

Mr. Chairman, I am not supporting this bill now before the committee for the reason that it includes my bill, but I am supporting it because I believe that it is necessary to a proper enforcement of the law. I am sure that the "bootleggers," "moonshiners," and others who violate the law of the land prefer that the bill do not become a law. They are well satisfied with delay in bringing them to trial, for their chances of escape are increased thereby. Of course, the enactment of this measure may add some additional costs to the Government, but it is a false economy in failing to provide properly for the courts that the dockets may be cleared and business expedited. This is not a political matter with me, for I know that a judge of my political faith will not be appointed in the eastern district of Oklahoma if this bill becomes a law. It should have been done when my party was in power, not for political purposes but because it was needed. Mr. Chairman, the judiciary should always be above politics, and when a judge renders a political opinion he then becomes unfit, in my opinion, to fill the position. [Applause.] It is the duty of the courts to construe the law as they find it, without favor, and honestly alike to the poor and the rich, the high and the low, the man in humble walks of life the same as the great, powerful, and influential after enacted by the legislative branch of the Government. The courts should not only protect property rights, but should at all times preserve the individual, constitutional rights of our entire citizenship. There is a limit to human endurance, and the impossible should not be expected. The proper facilities should be provided for the trial of cases and the enforcement of the law, and then we should see that court is held and the cases disposed of as speedily as possible. The rank and file of all political parties want the affairs of Government honestly, economically, and efficiently administered, and they want the machinery provided for that purpose. I believe in the principles of economy as my vote and record will show, but I always will vote for appropriations sufficient to have the courts properly run and the law efficiently administered. And, Mr. Chairman, I likewise will vote for adequate appropriations for the purpose of promoting our basic industry, agriculture, and to increase our trade with foreign countries that there may be a better market for the products of our farms, factories, and shops, and thereby provide for good wages and the better enjoyment of life. In the interest of law enforcement and the protection of the rights of our people, I believe that this bill should be passed, and hope that it will be enacted into law before this session of Congress adjourns. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this bill (H. R. 9103) does two things. It provides, in the first place, for a proper and logical coordination of the judges of the United States. That is a very necessary reform, and I think the committee is to be congratulated on that provision of the bill. I heartily approve that part of it.

It provides also for additional district judges. As to that matter the committee states that it has made ample provision. At a later moment, however, I shall offer an amendment as follows:

On page 2, line 14, after the word "one" insert: "For the district of Maryland, one."

The fourth judicial circuit under this bill gets no increase in judges. A judge was provided, as the committee has stated, an extra judge, for the eastern district of Virginia, but that on consideration was eliminated. I desire to call to your attention the need of an additional district judge in the district of Maryland, and I shall later include in my remarks a tabulation of the cases actually tried and disposed of in that district in the past five years.

The fourth judicial circuit contains West Virginia, Virginia, Maryland, North Carolina, and South Carolina. At the present time the district of Maryland, which is a part of that circuit, has one judge. There were pending on June 30, 51 civil cases, 33 criminal cases, 69 admiralty cases. I want to call your especial attention to the admiralty cases. The great waterways that center in the Chesapeake use this court. It is a very crowded court and a very important one. There were also 163 bankruptcy cases and 56 cases of other sorts. There are 372 cases pending. The population of the district in 1920 was 1,449,610. But here is the situation, as you will see from the table which I will file that there is not any district in the whole of this circuit or in this country where the judge works harder than Judge Rose of that district. Cases tried, and not cases pending, should be the test.

From the years 1910 until 1913 or 1914 there were two district judges in that district, and there were two courts working. I was United States attorney for that district from 1910 to 1915. In that time we had the so-called Bath Tub Trust case, and we had the American Can Antitrust prosecution. Two courts ran during that time until the death of Judge Morris. You will see from the summary of cases instituted and tried that it is only by extraordinary work, which should not be required of a district judge, that the docket is in the condition that it is. Unfortunately we have not here the reports from the other States of work done in past years in their districts. The real need of an associate judge could best be shown by a comparison between this district and districts of similar population in the United States. It might be interesting to make the comparison, especially with the districts in which new judges are to be appointed in accordance with the pending bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I will.

Mr. HARRISON. The gentleman speaks of the unfinished business in Maryland being 372 cases with one judge. In Oklahoma, a little State with two district judges, they have nearly 2,300 cases undisposed of. That is quite a difference.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman is quite correct. Now, a compilation taken from the annual reports of the Attorney General of the United States showing the total number of various cases in the United States district court for the district of Maryland, from June 30, 1914, to 1920, is as follows:

The report of the Attorney General for this year had just been published and there has been no opportunity to compare it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Texas will let me have two minutes more.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I will let the gentleman have one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is recognized for one additional minute.

Mr. HILL. The volume of work accomplished each year in the district of Maryland is very great because of the efficiency, hard work, and long hours of Judge Rose. But, gentlemen, it is not conducive to the proper disposal of the public business of the United States courts to sit too long. The courts should not sit excessive hours. I know one important prosecution of a criminal case which was tried for two weeks and which was lost simply because the judge—a judge from another district—insisted on holding the jury so long at night that they would not return verdicts of guilty as to any except one of many defendants.

Here is the tabulation showing the pending cases in the fourth circuit, which gets no additional judge under this bill:

The fourth circuit requires an additional judge and that judge should be assigned to the district of Maryland. I shall seek to accomplish this by amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, before you create new judgeships it might be well for Congress to make some investigation about the amount of real, honest service that the present judiciary is doing. Of course I realize that Congress is the one object toward which all criticism, whether true or false, can always be freely hurled, and that sort of criticism is indorsed by nearly everybody except the friends of the Congressmen in the individual districts. I think, however, one of the greatest evils that afflict the United States to-day is the lack of service on the part of the Federal judges throughout the United States.

Now, gentlemen, do not get shocked and frightened and angry, because generally if a man says anything in the world about a judge of any kind, about the judiciary, you will find a self-righteous man who will say, "You ought not to talk about a judge." You know Abraham Lincoln suffered for some time because he had the nerve and the courage to get up on the floor of this House and tell what he thought about the Federal judges. Now, I know you do not have any Abraham Lincolns in this House, and you do not have many of them left in this country, but we certainly need some who will without fear tell the truth about the Federal courts. The theory has been that they are not subject to the influence of public opinion, but I really think that the courts sometimes are almost as subject to public opinion as are other branches of our governmental institutions, and one of the judges told me that it is going too far to say that public opinion does not find expression when it makes, as it sometimes does, its way into the court and into our chambers. Since Congress can not control in any way the judiciary, and ought not under our system of government, when they do wrong public opinion alone can reach them. The people should know the facts. For example, the Supreme Court of the United States—and I have great respect for that great body—pretends to work only about seven months in the year. They adjourn along in June and do not return until October. Some of the Federal judges actually hold court only from 39 to 41 days in a year, and in one State the Federal judge himself said that he has never held court more than three months, and usually about from 40 to 60 days.

There was a great effort being made to create a new judge for that State. Well, some of the Congressmen prevented it, and we were very harshly criticized because we did not create an extra judge for that State.

If the Federal judges would work as the ordinary State judge does, you now have all the judges you need in the United States except in a few instances, and even in those cases, if they were properly apportioned and distributed, they could do the work that they are called upon to do. But of course it would require some of the judges to do something that they do not like to do. They will be required to work. They will be required to open court sometimes as early as 9 o'clock and run them perhaps, occasionally on terrible stresses, as late as 1 o'clock, and they will have to hold court something like eight or nine months in a year. Whether it is true in all the districts or not, it is true in most of the districts in the United States, that one of the great evils we have to-day is the tendency to put everything under the Federal Government and into the Federal courts, thus adding to the business of the Federal courts. If this is not stopped it will destroy the Government our fathers established.

I will tell you another thing: If you will take from the judge this life tenure of office you will have an entirely different mental attitude on the part of the judge toward the public and toward the performance of his duties. I never believed in a life tenure of office in a Republic. It may be harking back to that gentleman who is not very popular in these days—I may be harking back to the man who was Abraham Lincoln's ideal in politics, namely, Thomas Jefferson; and by the way, Abraham Lincoln and he agreed even on the subject of slavery; that is, Lincoln agreed with Thomas Jefferson. The one thing Jefferson hated Judge Marshall for was his attitude on the bench toward the Federal Government.

Mr. Jefferson said when he saw the first copy of the Constitution he could not support it, and one of the reasons for it was that under that instrument as it was then drawn the judges were amenable only to their consciences and to their God, and after being on the bench a while they would lose their conscience and forget their God. In another utterance of Jefferson concerning the judiciary, as then constituted, he called them sappers and miners. In other words, Mr. Jefferson never did become reconciled to a life tenure in office. I am no more reconciled to-day to a life tenure in office than he was.

No man has more respect for the courts of the country than I have. I think that any man who has not proper respect for the courts of the country is a dangerous citizen. But as a legislator, when an evil exists, even when it exists around the sanctity of the court room, somebody somewhere ought to call attention to the evil. These evils exist and are growing. Something must be done. Our people are staggering under the burdens of taxation, yet every day that Congress is in session these are increased.

As great as the evil is there is no way to get at it; Congress can not pass a law to control the judge. It has got to be by reason of an inherent desire in his heart and his soul to do his duty, unless public opinion can reach him and wake him up. Impeachment is the only remedy and that is not even a scarecrow.

I know when there is an opportunity to create one of these judgeships in your State, of course, you want it. You are not going to stop to consider, very many of you—I do not know whether any of you will stop to consider, "Well, we do not especially need it. All we have got to do is to let the judges do a little more work." Why not now say that and save the taxpayer from additional burdens? No; you will not. The question is, "I want to get a new judge in my district, and I have got a good fellow, who is a friend of mine, who wants the place, and Senator So-and-so is going to recommend him for me and that will help me get back." No thought of the people's interest. When the Democrats are in power it is some good Democratic lawyer, and when the Republicans are in power it is some good Republican lawyer. If you will remove that motive behind the creation of many of these judgeships, you will find no influence here to create these new judgeships. No doubt there are a few instances where the business of the country demands an additional judge. They are the exception, and I want to repeat that if you will apportion the work better, if you will permit the judge to go from the territory where he has nothing to do into the territory that is congested, in other words, if you will simply readjust the Federal judgeships in this country you will have no need for another judge. Pie, judicial pie, is the moving power behind this bill.

There is perhaps one evil that grows out of this life tenure, and that is that many of these judges stay on the bench long after they ought to retire, declining to go back to private life, and are unfitted to perform the duties of the office, and this causes congested dockets and a demand for more judges. I happen to have in mind the cases of two very estimable gentlemen, fine men, who refused to be retired, and held their term of office long after they ought to have been retired. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fourteen Members present, a quorum.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOODYKOONTZ].

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it seems to me that the disposition of some people in the country to pick upon Members of Congress is only equaled by the disposition of some Members of Congress to pick upon the Federal judiciary. My opinion is, for whatever it may be worth, that the Federal judges of the Nation taken as a class are the equals of any other class of men in this or any other country for respectability, courage, intelligence, and industry. It occurs to me to say that a body of men of the caliber of the Representatives of the people in Congress owe a duty to these judges to defend them when assailed and to challenge any man who attacks their reputation for industry and other good qualities whenever the occasion shall arise, whether it be here or elsewhere. To attack the judiciary is to undermine one of the great institutions set up by the Constitution. I care not what Jefferson may have said or done in assaulting the name of the great Chief Justice Marshall, but of the judges who have sat upon the Federal bench in America Marshall was the greatest star of all, and his power and influence for the good and glory of the Republic shines now with a refulgence as great as that of any patriot who has ever lived. [Applause.]

When this bill arrives at the amendment stage I shall offer a suggestion—a proposition—to provide an additional judge for the State of West Virginia, not because "Senators may have the privilege of filling the place with some one of their selections," but in the interest of law and order in my State to take care of that constantly increasing population that has been and is now being attracted there by the great resources of that State. The high cost of transportation is bringing many industries to West Virginia. Great manufacturing concerns are going there in order to be near our great coal fields. Capital from New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Indianapolis, Chicago, Cincinnati, Richmond, and many other places is being invested in that State, which is so rich and powerful in natural resources. In West Virginia cattle graze upon the sod of a thousand hills. She has immense resources of timber, oil, and gas, and of the coal that runs the furnaces of the mills and factories and the Navy of the United States. Her people are as good as any. The great majority of them are of the best, but the flotsam and jetsam of other States and everywhere else naturally come drifting into that new and growing and developing State, so that there arises the necessity for an additional judge to take care of infractions of the criminal law and to settle controversies arising in civil transactions. If I am correctly informed, the Attorney General arrived at the conclusion that if an additional judge were put into Virginia such additional judge could take care of the situation in West Virginia, where the calendars of the courts have been and are now greatly congested. But the thought that an additional judge were necessary in Virginia was not justified after the President had seen fit to select a circuit judge from that State, a lawyer from Richmond, and put him upon the bench, thereby giving to the Old Dominion three resident judges; so that the necessity for an additional judge in West Virginia is warranted by the facts, justified in the interest of good government required for the maintenance of law and order, and therefore a compelling necessity. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia yields back four minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and one Members present, a quorum.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN].

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, a measure to create 23 more judges of the Federal courts of the United States seems to me uncalled for at this time, when from one end of this Nation to the other, in Cabinet meetings and in all of the conferences of both parties, and in the Congress of the United States, everyone has said that something must be done to curtail the expenses of government. But I presume that one of the supposed exigencies for this increase of the Federal judges is the enforcement of the law carried in the obnoxious, partisan, sectional bill that is before the Rules Committee for consideration now, to be brought before the House in the near future, called the antilynching bill. I suppose that must be considered by the Republicans one of the necessities for all of these Federal judges.

In my judgment, many of the Federal judges of the United States do not put in on an average two hours a day throughout the entire year. In the State of Mississippi the Federal judge has rarely been known to hold court more than a few hours a day, and very few courts during the year. The excuse that is brought here to put on the pay roll 23 additional judges does not seem to me to warrant this Congress in passing this measure. The fact of it is, I wish we had fewer judges than we have to-day. Instead of increasing them I would decrease them.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. QUIN. I can not yield, Mr. Chairman; I have only five minutes. As I say, instead of increasing these judges, I would decrease them. Instead of increasing the number of citizens of the United States who have the right to hold office as a Federal judge by appointment of the President of the United States, I would decrease the number. Instead of their being appointed for life by the President, I would have them elected by the people, the same as the Senators of the United States are elected.

As long as we have this pretense of increasing the Federal judges of the United States, so long will you increase the centralizing and autocratic power of the few. A judge who is appointed by the Chief Executive of the Nation for life is bound, from the very nature of things, in the course of time to become autocratic in the method of conducting his court. So long as you have this method of naming the Federal judges you will build up that centralized power wherein the few can be heard and the many never. I do not think Congress should pass this bill at a time when all of the people of the United States are demanding the curtailment of Government expenses, particularly when no one has given any legitimate reason, so far as I can see; when there is no just demand for an increase in the number of judges except upon the part of those who are seeking the pie. Why, this will mean that there will be 23 splendid jobs, none of them for less than $7,500 per year, and some of them for more, to be dished out to 23 "worthy Republicans" throughout the United States of America.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. QUIN. I hope that remark did not bring down the expiration of my time. Will the gentleman yield me some more time?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I hope that when these 23 worthy Republicans shall get these splendid plums, lifetime jobs, hanging on the backs of the people who must toil in the United States, that they will not be the type who think they alone know all of the law and that all power is vested in them.

I must say that if you push through that obnoxious, unconstitutional antilynching bill that you have before the Rules Committee now, I hope these 23 worthy Republicans will not come into the State of Mississippi to do what you endeavor to do in that bill, namely, bring back the carpetbag government, bring back the bad days that our people suffered there from 1866 clean on up to 1876. I hope that none of the gentlemen who vote for that antilynching bill which is hanging before the Rules Committee now will ever have occasion to cause one of the 23 worthy Republicans who will be named under this measure that you are considering to-day, to sit and do injustice to the counties of any State of this Nation. That measure that you have proposed is conceived in inquity and is born in animosity, and if it passes through this House it will doom to destruction whatever element of decency the Republican Party has throughout the different sections of the South. My judgment is that on the Republican side of the House you ought to be a unit in opposing that measure which is proposed at this time. You gentlemen hold power in this Congress because of your great number and you should not allow such a measure as that to be passed through the Congress with your votes. We few Democrats are helpless to prevent this great wrong, and you all know it and are taking advantage of your great majority. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has again expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Minnesota yield to me for a question?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. What is the purpose of the gentleman? Does he propose to try to finish this bill to-night?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. My idea was to conclude general debate and read the first section.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Still leaving that section open to amendment?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, how much time remains?

The CHAIRMAN. Forty-two minutes on each side.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BOIES].

Mr. BOIES. Mr. Chairman, I wish to first declare that Iowa is to receive no additional judge under this bill. It seems to me proper to remark here that the judiciary of this country, followed from the organization of the Government to the present time, needs no defense in a town meeting, in a political convention, nor in this great body. If there is a branch of this Government that should not be touched by politics it is the judiciary. I am surprised that the opposition to this bill comes from the minority side of this Chamber. I do not forget that prior to the 4th day of last March there were several applications presented to the Committee on the Judiciary of this House by Democrats for additional Federal judges. Since that time the demand has been rather quiet from their standpoint.

Mr. Chairman, I have a statistical table here that I ask be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, in the larger type of the RECORD, so that it may be easily read, and I trust that it will be helpful in the discussion under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated by inserting a table. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOIES. Mr. Chairman, it has been suggested here frequently that there are districts in this country that have so little work to do that the judges in such districts might assist in relieving the work in the congested districts. This table will be helpful in showing the contrary of that proposition, that there is no district in the United States where the judge has not all of the work that he can do, and no relief can come from that source. The Chief Justice of the United States and the Attorney General and the committee acting under them have recommended the passage of this bill. If we had no other information, it seems to me that those gentlemen are of such high character that we could without much alarm follow their advice and suggestion. This table is taken from the report of the Attorney General for 1920, and it is also offered for the purpose of meeting the inquiry that has been made here as to how the work to-day compares with the work a year ago, and whether it is on the increase or not. The table I think will afford some illumination on that point. The table gives the names of all of the States in the Union, together with the population. Under column 2 it gives the present number of judges; to the right of the present number, indicated by the sign of addition, the proposed increase. Under column 3 is shown cases per judge pending June 30, 1920. Under column 4 the selective draft cases pending June 30, 1920, are shown. Column 5 shows the national prohibition cases pending June 30, 1919, and the national prohibition cases pending June 30, 1920. Column 7 shows cases exclusive of draft and bankruptcy on June 30, 1920, and cases per judge other than draft and bankruptcy cases pending June 30, 1920.

I append herewith the table referred to:

Cases pending in Minnesota Mar. 31, 1921, covering the first 9 months of the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921, and which will appear in the report of the Attorney General for that year.

I am not especially interested in the State of Minnesota, but having become familiar with the situation there, simply as a person who ought to be interested in the things that are proper and right, I present as a part of this table an addition affecting the State of Minnesota. This showing is from the official record of June 30, 1921. The State of Minnesota constitutes one district, having two judges, but one of them, on account of his physical condition, is unable to do much work. This additional table shows that there were pending on last June undetermined in that State 2,251 cases in the Federal court of Minnesota. The rate of increase of business for the first nine months of the fiscal year 1921 indicates a rate of increase not foreseen in 1920. There were 2,251 cases pending on March 31, 1921. If two judges were to try one case per day, excluding Sunday, for three and one-half years the calendars of the Minnesota court as they stood on March 31, 1921, would be cleared of cases pending on the date last mentioned. But the Minneapolis & St. Paul Street Railway rate cases, involving the valuation of all the properties of the street railways; the telephone rate cases, involving the valuation of all the properties of the Northwestern & Tri-State Co. in the State of Minnesota; and the railway rate-lowering cases of Minneapolis are of themselves sufficient to occupy the attention of one judge for one year.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think anyone familiar with the Federal judiciary, notwithstanding the criticism that has been made or is made at times, will agree that they are, ordinarily speaking, capable, able, hard-working men. It is one of the most important and honorable positions in the gift of the American people. A stable, level-headed, courageous judge can do more to stabilize the conditions in the community in which he lives than any other or all the other officers combined. A delay of the cases, civil or criminal, in our courts is a denial of justice. It deprives a man of his right to his property, to his life, to his happiness, and nothing is more conducive to a good, wholesome feeling in a community, in a county, a State, or a Nation, than to have such a number of judges and courts that the business should be current as near as it can be.

Now, in regard to some criticism that was just made relative to this side of the House, it becomes quite pertinent that I refer to a little past history. Four years ago there was—and I am going to refer simply to the northern district of California and thereby not scatter—a bill passed creating an additional judge for the northern district of California in the Senate. It came to the House Committee on the Judiciary and was unanimously reported favorably by the now Senator, then Member, Mr. CARAWAY. Gentlemen on that side of the House objected to the final consideration of that bill, and it was not disposed of during the Sixty-fifth Congress. During the Sixty-sixth Congress a similar bill passed the Senate and was sent to the House Committee on the Judiciary. Hearings were had. I want to refer to the history regarding that and the necessity for the legislation.

There is no district in the United States, and the examination of the record will show it, where the business is as great and in which there were then, during those four years, as many live, pending cases, according to the judges per district as in the northern district of the State of California. And during two long years, while those people were suffering and demanding justice at the hands of this Congress, the full record shows we could not get a move toward creating an additional judge, to the end that these litigants might have their business disposed of.

Now, I want to call your attention to this in order to show that there is no question of sufficiency of the evidence. Hearings were had, and then we could not get it. The Members of the California delegation, irrespective of party, unanimously filed and sent to the Judiciary Committee a request, a copy of which I hold in my hand, signed by each of the Members, asking that at least the Committee on the Judiciary take up and act upon this legislation. They could not get any result. The hearings can be found as of date of February 18, 1920, on the bill S. 1358. It says there that there were something over 4,000 pending active cases, and besides over 1,800 cases that had not been called for four years before, that the people demanded to be attended to. Now, see whether or not we can get any relief. This bill does not add anything to what is really in practice now in the Federal courts. We have now, instead of taking up and analyzing and investigating and determining each case for itself and letting each case stand upon its own merits, an omnibus bill, a sort of bill intended to rake in all of them, but I do not know whether any of the other provisions of the bill are such as would compel me to vote against it or not. But the necessities of the northern district of California require and demand they should have relief from the congestion of the calendar.

During the year 1916 there were judges called in to participate in that court, Morrow, Hunt, Ross, Sawtelle, Dietrich, Bledsoe, Trippet, and Rudkin, making 142 days of actual trial held by those outside judges, saying nothing about the time it took them to go over the records and the briefs and prepare the trial of the cases and dispose of them. Now, during 1918 there were the following judges from outside, namely, Morrow, Hunt, Rudkin, Trippet, Sawtelle, Wolverton, Bledsoe, Neterer, Cushman, Bean, and Farrington. There were 308 days of actual work, not of two hours each, but from 9 o'clock until sometimes 7 o'clock, and evening sessions were held by that court in San Francisco also. There were 365 days of actual work outside of the judges in that district. During 1919—and I did not get this last year—there were judges who served to the extent of 254 days. This is a certified record by the clerk of the court as to the actual days served by those judges who tried those cases. The district judges, the clerk, the marshal, the district attorney all show the necessity, by presentation, for the creation of an additional judge, so that this work can go forward. And in addition to that there is in each one of those years the work of at least two judges in the trying of cases during the whole year. They came from other districts.

When we talk about new legislation here we should remember that if the judges are in the district and are requested, they will come and do the work; but nevertheless and notwithstanding the fact that efforts were made, as the record shows, to get other judges, they could not be had, because their business would not permit them—the business of their courts would not permit them—to go to San Francisco and hold court.

I am not in a position to say whether or not the other 22 places are as urgent as the northern district of California, because I have not gone into the matter and must of necessity take the report and the judgment of the committee. But it is unfortunate, as the record shows, that for five years over 5,000 active cases, notwithstanding the enormous amount of work done, were then on the docket of that district. Outside of New York, where there are four, if not five, judges—I think it is in the southern district—there were more cases actually tried and convictions obtained, 2 to 1, than in any other district in the United States, and then all these judges from Idaho, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, Arizona, Washington, and Oregon were brought in to assist.

I will append to my remarks a joint letter on the subject addressed to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary and the chairman of the subcommittee of that committee, as follows:

UNITED STATES HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 27, 1920.

Hon. ANDREW J. VOLSTEAD,
Chairman Committee on the Judiciary, and
Hon. JOSEPH WALSH,
Chairman Subcommittee on Senate 1358,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: We, the undersigned members of the California delegation, most respectfully call to your attention the hearings had before your committee on February 18, 1920, on Senate 1358, pages 31 to 54, inclusive.

The urgency and necessity for this legislation is fully presented in the hearings. The record shows the large number of cases pending before said court and undisposed of. It further shows that during the last three years that outside judges have been called in to an extent that has amounted to more than the services of more than one judge during the entire three years. The expense to the Government will be but little more, if any, by the providing for an additional judge for the northern district of California. Under the present conditions many litigants are denied the opportunity to be heard, and in many cases, both civil and criminal, it is in effect a denial of justice. This legislation is urged by the unanimous voice of the people of the State of California, as well as their Representatives in Congress.

We therefore take this opportunity of calling your attention to this important matter and earnestly urge that the bill may be disposed of by your committee to the end that the House may act upon it at an early date and that much needed relief by provided for.

Respectfully submitted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, while I have not had an opportunity to go into the various details of the situations in the various States which are sought to be relieved by this bill, yet I have gone into the Tennessee situation very thoroughly, and I profess to know something about Tennessee.

The need for an additional Federal judgeship in Tennessee has been recognized for a great many years in both this House and in the Senate, and from time to time during the last few years bills creating such a judgeship have been pending, and while bills have passed both Houses on the subject they did not pass both Houses during the same session. It will be recalled that during the last session the Senate passed a bill creating this judgeship, but it did not pass the House on account of lack of time. I was in favor of the bill at that time, although I recognized that, the administration being Democratic, a Democratic judge would be appointed; and now, since the administration has changed and become Republican, I have not changed my attitude on the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that there is poor economy in denying the people proper court facilities. As a matter of fact, the records in the Department of Justice will show that our Federal courts have always been self-sustaining. In fact, some revenue, as I understand, has been yearly turned into the Treasury from the Federal judiciary. Our court in Tennessee will not entail any additional expense other than the salary of the judge and the salary of the stenographer. It will not necessitate the appointment of any additional United States marshals or clerks, because there will be no additional courts held. Judge Edward J. Sanford, our present district judge, has the reputation of being one of the most able, industrious, painstaking, courageous, and courteous district judges in the whole country. He holds court now at five different places, and the creation of a new judgeship will not necessitate the establishment of any additional courts.

During the last five years the business of the district courts in Tennessee has increased more than 100 per cent, and there is no indication that it will subside soon. I have a copy of a letter which Judge Sanford sent to the Attorney General, at the request of the Attorney General's office, which shows that it would take him one year, busy every day in the year, to dispose of the business that has already accumulated and that is now on his docket.

As I said a moment ago, there is no more industrious judge than Judge Sanford, but an industrious judge should not be imposed on. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, in a great many of the criminal cases that we have the defendants, recognizing that to plead not guilty means a continuance of their cases, do so plead, and the expense resulting from that practice will much more than exceed the expense of this new judgeship. As a matter of fact, it is vulgar to talk of expense when such wholesome and necessary legislation as this is under consideration. As I said at the outset, to deny the people proper court facilities is in effect a denial of justice. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee yields back one minute.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON]. May I ask in this connection, Mr. Chairman, how much time remains?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has 32 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] has 27 minutes. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to notice one or two things in connection with the details of this bill. I think the chairman of the committee will at least admit them. On page 4 of the bill, lines 18 to 23, the provision is made that in districts having more than one district judge "the report herein required shall be prepared and submitted by the district judge who is senior in length of service." Two years ago we passed an act authorizing the President to appoint an additional judge in any district in which the judge presiding had become unable, in the judgment of the President, to fully discharge the duties of the office, and it was provided that the additional district judge so appointed should be the ranking judge. That is the language of the statute, and therefore he controls the business done, and he assigns to the old district judge the duties that he has to perform and the work that he has to do.

Now, you propose by this action to take that power away from the ranking, active judge who has been appointed because of the disability of the older man, and put on the man who is not actively in charge of the work the discharge of those duties which are necessarily closely in the purview of the new judge who has been appointed and by law is made the ranking judge of the district. I think the report should be required from the ranking judge and not from the judge of the senior commission. If he has not been outranked by one of these emergency judges appointed, the older judge will be the ranking judge. But if he has been outranked, he is practically in retirement and on duty in retirement.

Then, as to the proposed amendment offered by the committee, the provision is made—

> That after four years from the passage of this act the death, resignation, or removal of any district judge in any district for which additional appointments are herein authorized shall not create a vacancy to authorize the appointment of a successor, unless, within 60 days after such death, resignation, or removal, the Attorney General of the United States and the senior circuit judge of the judicial circuit embracing the court and district affected shall certify in writing to the President that the condition and volume of business in the district courts within said judicial circuit are such that in their judgment the public interest requires the appointment of such successor.

Now, either that is a limitation placed upon the appointing power of the President, to be exercised by two officials, the Attorney General and a circuit judge, and therefore an invasion of the prerogatives of the President—and an invasion which I think this House should not countenance, whether it is competent to make that invasion or not—or it is an invasion of the power of the Congress to declare a vacancy. Congress might say absolutely, as it has done in the act passed two years ago providing for an extra judge wherever the presiding judge is now unable to discharge properly the duties of his office, that on the death of the senior judge, who is thus practically retired, there shall not be another appointment made unless there is action by Congress. Congress has the right to say that, and it is now abrogating that right absolutely, turning it over to the Attorney General and the senior circuit judge of the circuit in which the vacancy occurs. I think it is objectionable, because it is putting a limitation upon the power of the President to appoint if there is a vacancy existing and it ought to be done, and it is objectionable, on the other hand, because it is delegating our power to somebody in the executive and judicial departments, making a combination between executive and judicial action to declare a vacancy which ought to be declared only by the legislative department.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not know what this four-year provision means. I take it for granted that gentlemen are casting their eyes forward to another administration that may come in about four years from now, and they want the door left open to appoint without any limitation at all as long as they are assured that there is a Republican President. I take it that must be the meaning of this language, and that, forsooth, because there will be uncertainty about it afterwards they will require the conjoint action of a circuit judge, who, if appointed now, is liable to be a Republican, and of the Attorney General; and if they can not act conjointly, then there will be no declaration of any vacancy and the Democratic President who will probably be elected in 1924 will be unable to appoint when a vacancy occurs.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. LINEBERGER] five minutes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield five minutes additional to the gentleman from California [Mr. LINEBERGER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. LINEBERGER] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to address myself to the House on the pending bill. I shall vote for the bill as reported out by the committee. The matter upon which I do desire to address the House, however, is one of vital import to the country at this time.

A determined effort is being made by the chairman of the United States Shipping Board, seconded by interested commercial steamship companies, to have the President by Executive order discontinue the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps transport service, and have all of the carrying of personnel and supplies for these departments turned over to commercial steamship companies.

The principal effort now being made is to discontinue the transport service in the Pacific and turn the business over to a commercial line, which will operate ships from the west coast to the Orient.

The plan of the Shipping Board is to use the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps business as a nucleus around which to build up their commercial business. It can readily be seen that the military and naval services will always receive secondary consideration. Our soldiers and sailors will be transported as steerage passengers in common with the Asiatics, who are the only class of steerage passengers traveling between the United States and the Orient. It is understood that the proposal of the Shipping Board provides for a fixed reduction from the regular rates charged by commercial steamship companies.

An investigation of the cost of the regular transport service and of the cost of transporting troops and supplies by the Shipping Board shows that the Government will pay more than double the amount which it would cost the Army and Navy to do the same service by Government-owned transports.

A rough estimate of the relative cost of the Army Transport Service, and of the cost of the same service if performed by commercial lines under direction of the Shipping Board, shows the following:

	Per year.
Pacific service:
Army transports	$2,250,000
By Shipping Board	5,250,000
Atlantic service:
Army transports	2,200,000
By Shipping Board	5,000,000

This shows that while the Army Transport Service can operate for approximately $4,500,000, the Shipping Board would require $10,250,000 for the same service, or a difference of $5,750,000. This latter amount would constitute, therefore, a subsidy of $5,750,000 paid the Shipping Board from appropriations for the Army each year.

While the economic feature is a very important one, the most vital element in so far as the military and naval services are concerned is that of the character of the transportation which would be furnished the Army and Navy personnel by commercial lines, and particularly the enlisted men.

Officers traveling on leave, members of officers' families on foreign service, officers and members of their families returning to the United States on account of sickness from foreign stations, and noncommissioned officers and members of their families who are not entitled to have their transportation paid by the Government would all be required to pay the excess prices charged by the commercial lines.

This would practically mean that the families of officers, noncommissioned officers, and particularly of civilian employees of the War and Navy Departments could not join the heads of their families while on the tour of foreign service, which under the present proposal of Congress is to extend over a period of three years.

The Army and Navy Transport Services also have extended, under authority of Congress, the privilege of transportation to Members of the Senate and House of Representatives and the various executive departments of the Government. This privilege provides for traveling on transports at actual cost, which is about one-fifth of that normally charged by the passenger-carrying commercial lines.

Another important feature is that the trained personnel of the Army and Navy Transport Services, many of whom have been in these services since the Spanish-American War, would find themselves out of employment, as it would be necessary to discharge them from their present positions. The commercial lines operated by the Shipping Board already have their permanent personnel on the vessels to be used, and there would therefore be no place for taking in the present civilian personnel of the Army and Navy Transport Services. A number of ship's officers, engineers, stewards, and seamen of various grades would thus be displaced and forced to seek positions in an overcongested marine labor market. This would immediately affect over 1,000 employees of the shore establishments and crews of vessels engaged in the transpacific service alone, and eventually an equal number engaged in the Atlantic Army Transport Service.

Many of the employees of the Army and Navy Transport Services have remained in these services with the prospect of retirement when they had completed the required number of years of service or had reached the retirement age. Their discharge from the service would therefore nullify all of their previous record and long service.

The commercial lines would not be governed by any sentiment in regard to taking into their services the employees of the Army and Navy Transport Services, and they could not be expected to discharge their own faithful employees of long service to make a place for these surplus Government employees.

The representatives of the Steamship Owners' Association recently had a hearing on the Edmonds bill (H. R. 5348). I quote that bill as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5348) to amend sections 17 and 19 of the merchant marine act, 1920.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 17 of the merchant marine act, 1920, shall be amended by adding a new paragraph, as follows:

"Whenever the Shipping Board finds it possible to utilize the transport of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps as a basis for the establishing of permanent steamship lines, the President may, if he deems it advisable, discontinue such service by the Government and contract for a period not to exceed 10 years with the new service proposed: Provided, That no contract shall be made with any steamship company whose ownership is less than 75 per cent American, and all of whose ships, owned directly or through subsidiaries, are registered or enrolled under the laws of the United States."

SEC. 2. That section 19 of the merchant marine act, 1920, shall be amended by adding a new paragraph, as follows:

"(5) That any contemplated extension of service by the Panama Steamship Co. shall be submitted to the Shipping Board for approval, and all extensions of service made by this company since in control of the Government shall be approved of by the Shipping Board, or discontinued, and all freight rates established by this company shall be in agreement with rates established by the board for its operators, and be subject to the approval of the board."

This bill provides for the discontinuance of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps Transport Services, and the turning over of the business to commercial lines was the recommendation of the Secretary of War, Elihu H. Root, made in 1902.

The Secretary of War in this report expressed the opinion that this business would be more economically done by privately owned commercial steamship lines than by Government-owned transport service.

Congress took prompt action to protect the Army Transport Service by the act of March 2, 1903, which reads as follows:

No action looking to the discontinuance of the Transport Service shall be taken without further action of Congress. (Act of Mar. 2, 1903, 32 Stats., 939.)

It is an interesting fact that Secretary Root never again renewed his original recommendation, and it appears that he was convinced, after further experience in the Office of the Secretary of War, that the continued operation of the Transport Services was to the best interest of the Government.

Some years later a further attempt was made by interested commercial lines to discontinue the Transport Service in the Pacific. Congress again came to the rescue by passing the following law:

Act of March 3, 1905: Hereafter no steamship in the Transport Service of the United States shall be sold or disposed of without the consent of Congress having been first had or obtained.

It appears that those interests seeking to influence the President to discontinue the present military and naval transport services by Executive order base the authority for doing so upon the provision in the act creating the United States Shipping Board. The specific authority under which this action is sought is contained in section 6 of the act of September 7, 1916, as follows:

The President may transfer either permanently or for limited periods to the board such vessels belonging to the War or Navy Departments as are suitable for commercial uses and not required for military or naval use in time of peace, and cause to be transferred to the board vessels owned by the Panama Railroad Co. and not required in its business.

There is a difference of opinion as to the authority conferred upon the President by the provisions in the Shipping Board act. The act clearly states that vessels belonging to the War and Navy Departments may be transferred when "not required for military or naval use in time of peace."

The transport service of the War and Navy Departments are considered as legally authorized branches of the Military and Naval Establishments, and the right of the President to discontinue these branches without authority of Congress has been strongly questioned.

It is a well-established principle that the executive branch of the Government can not nullify or set aside the clear provisions of an act of Congress or take any steps that are in direct violation of the specific provisions of such acts. Acts of Congress can only be nullified or rescinded by the action of Congress itself.

The provision in the act of March 2, 1903, that no steps looking to the discontinuance of the transport service shall be taken without further action of Congress is a distinct prohibition of any executive action by the President which would discontinue the military and naval transport services.

The effect of such an action by the President without authority of Congress would be too serious for such action to be taken without a careful consideration of all of the consequences.

To use the appropriations made for the Military and Naval Establishments as a subsidy for the operation of private commercial steamship lines, even though they may be operating under the general supervision of the Shipping Board, will naturally meet with very strong opposition of Military and Naval Committees of both branches of Congress.

The military and naval transport services have been most economically and efficiently operated since the Spanish-American War. They have a highly trained and efficient civilian personnel, who are entitled to all the benefits conferred by Congress upon civilian employees as to retirement and protection in their civil-service positions, and these employees would lose all of these advantages by the discontinuance of the services.

It has been clearly demonstrated that the military and naval transport services can be actually operated for much less cost to the Government than it would be possible to have the same service performed by commercial lines.

The control of the overseas transportation of military and naval forces and supplies by the War and Navy Departments is vitally necessary for the efficient functioning of these services, and particularly to meet emergencies of the character which have several times arisen during the past 20 years. Another important feature to be considered is the fact that the War Department and the Navy Department are permanent establishments in the executive branch of the Government.

The United States Shipping Board can only be regarded as an agency that was created during an emergency. With the passing of the emergency, which rendered its creation desirable, and with the present apparent antagonism of the commercial maritime interests to its continuing as a permanent shipping agency, it is very probably that its present organization will be discontinued and that it will pass to the control of one of the established executive departments of the Government.

It was commonly understood at the time of the coming into office of the present administration that the activities of the Shipping Board and of the Emergency Fleet Corporation would be placed under the direction and control and absorbed by the Department of Commerce. This rumor was so strong that it apparently had a great deal of influence in preventing experienced shipping men from accepting the chairmanship of the board. While they were willing to accept the position so long as it was independent in character, they would not care to accept it as a temporary office and with the prospect of its being absorbed by the Department of Commerce.

It is also well known that there is a strong feeling in Congress against the continuance of the Shipping Board in its present independent capacity.

The record of the United States Shipping Board from an economic standpoint has not been such as to reflect credit on governmental administration. The mercantile marine companies have also felt that the Shipping Board has not been in full sympathy with their interests and that its management has been along the line of active competition with the private steamship lines.

It is a well-known fact that the Shipping Board has not been able to economically conduct any of its enterprises and that its operations have resulted in a continued steady loss to the Government aggregating hundreds of millions of dollars.

Those Members of Congress and others who have become interested in the question as to the discontinuance of the military and naval transport services naturally question the good business judgment of those who would discontinue services which have been efficiently and economically managed for a long number of years and turning over their activities to another Government agency of a purely temporary character that has been charged with gross extravagance and mismanagement and that is now being operated at a continual loss to the Government. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, the discussion heretofore had on H. R. 8928, the reclassification bill, makes it apparent that considerable misapprehension and consequent misgiving exist concerning the financial effects of the scheme of reclassification and the compensation schedules proposed. In order that the House may be as fully informed as available figures make it possible, I will insert in the RECORD certain compilations and tables.

The first table I insert shows an allocation of the entire personnel affected by the bill to their respective services and grades within the services as of April 30, 1919, the latest date concerning which entirely complete figures are available to your Committee on Reform in the Civil Service and the former Joint Congressional Commission on Reclassification and the various agencies and persons who cooperated with the joint commission. The table shows the total number of employees at that time, their distribution both by number and percentage throughout the different services, the total amount of compensation for each grade, and the average pay of an employee in each such grade.

The relative importance of the different services and grades within services in the District of Columbia on the basis of numbers, compensation, and average pay, Apr. 30, 1919.

It will be observed that on that date the total number of employees was 90,815, their total compensation was $132,310,618, and the average pay was $1,457.

Through the Committee on Appropriations the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service was furnished an estimate of the number of employees in the departments in Washington and the estimated annual pay rolls as of November 15, 1921. As I understand it, it is not claimed that these estimates are complete and accurate, but they approximate actual conditions sufficiently to form a reliable basis of comparison:

Average salary, $1,593.

From these two tables it will appear that the personnel in the District of Columbia has been reduced from April 30, 1919, to November 15, 1921, by 21,447, the average pay has increased $136, and the total pay roll decreased $21,783,917.

Under the scheme of the reclassification bill a great majority of the employees will initially receive compensation at the lowest salary rate in the ranges of salaries for the various grades, and through the course of years, when stability in the system has been established, will average in each grade at the middle or medium rate. It is obvious that the original cost will be decidedly less than the ultimate cost. The following table shows what the increase in the ultimate cost would be, assuming the same number of employees now and in the future as in April, 1919. This table embraces only the principal services, but the omission of the remaining employees will in no way affect the correctness of the comparison:

However, as the number of employees has already been reduced by over 21,000, and as the average salary rate has been increased from $1,457 to $1,593, and as the average salary rate ultimately under H. R. 8928 would be $1,591, this increase is apparent rather than real, and there would certainly be no substantial initial increase. Furthermore, a comparatively small reduction in the personnel would absorb the entire increase and result in a net reduction of the cost of maintaining the civil service.

But the committee in charge of the bill has been made aware of the very general sentiment in the House against any present increase in the cost of the civil service, and against providing now for any possible increase in the future. It seems to be the judgment of the membership that reduction in personnel should result in actual saving to the Treasury. Therefore, the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, although maintaining that the schedules in the bill as reported were neither excessive, extravagant, nor unreasonable, have nevertheless agreed to accept suggestions for a downward revision of these schedules, which will result in a saving in the cost of the civil service immediately and in no appreciable increase in such cost in the future.

The following is the proposed revision:

PROFESSIONAL SERVICE.

GRADE 1.

In bill, $1,800, $1,920, $2,040, and $2,160.
As revised, $1,620, $1,740, $1,860, and $1,980.

GRADE 2.

In bill, $2,340, $2,520, $2,700, and $2,880.

I insert at this point a table showing the same comparisons between the revised schedules and conditions existing in April, 1919, as is shown in the foregoing table in which the original rates in the bill were employed.

If the rates in the Lehlbach bill were reduced in the manner suggested by the committee as possible, the estimate of the cost for the professional, subprofessional, clerical, custodial, and inspectional would be as follows, assuming that the number of employees and rate of pay had remained constant since April 30, 1919, excepting the changes in the bonus:

Service and grade.	Employees in the professional, subprofessional, clerical, custodial, and inspectional services working full time and receiving no allowance: April 30, 1919.

In this connection also it must be kept in mind that the reduction of the force and the present increase in average salary will more than wipe out the apparent ultimate increase in the cost of the civil service estimated at 1.6 per cent, and will result in no increase whatsoever. The average ultimate salary under the revised schedules will be $1,496 as against the average present salary of $1,593, according to the estimate furnished by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN].

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman and gentleman of the committee, no right is more sacred to the American people than that which makes for speedy and efficient administration of justice. We should always have a sufficient number of judges to secure this right, but this does not mean we should create judges unnecessarily and locate them in places not needed.

The wholesale method of creating judges in accordance with provisions of this bill is out of the ordinary, and I fear may result in subjecting the judiciary to the "pork-barrel" criticism which has heretofore been aimed at so much congressional legislation.

Some months ago the Judiciary Committee, we are told, consulted the Attorney General regarding conditions obtaining in the Federal courts. As a result, he appointed a committee headed by the Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court to investigate and report as to the advisability of appointing new judges for such courts. The committee recommended the appointment of 18 additional judges. We assume the committee thus appointed was competent and did its work faithfully, but for some reason the committee reporting the pending bill has not followed its recommendation. Indeed, it has increased the number recommended by nearly 25 per cent, the bill providing for 22 instead of 18 additional judges. The reason for such increase is not definitely stated. We may assume, however, that 18 was not sufficient for political emergencies. I do not understand that the committee, selected by the Attorney General, recommended judges for any particular State or district. It recommended 18 should be selected and assigned for duty wherever needed. Such system as proposed may not be without its virtues, but it would not be entirely free from criticism.

Some of us regard the suggested system the entering wedge to the reestablishment of what is known in the South as the "carpetbag system," and hence feel a natural prejudice against it. But there seems to be little or no necessity of discussing this phase of the situation, for the committee has not followed that recommendation, but has instead reported a bill which gives to designated districts in several States additional judges.

Section 3, which proposes an amendment to section 13 of the Judicial Code, seems to provide machinery whereby it would be possible under certain circumstances to designate a judge from North Carolina, or other State, to preside over the courts in Florida or elsewhere. I assume that the administration of this provision would, generally speaking, prove satisfactory, but I can understand wherein it might result in inefficiency and useless expense to litigants. The rules of law and procedure obtaining in the various States are to be enforced in the district courts of such States, hence a judge sent from North Carolina to preside over the courts of Georgia or Florida might be learned and well qualified for duty in his native State yet unfamiliar with the laws of Georgia or Florida, and, therefore, inefficient for service in such State. A judge going from a code State to one in which only the common law prevails, or vice versa, would probably find himself very much confused and unable to render best service.

I regret that I can not agree to the provision of the bill respecting allocation of judges to be appointed. If the figures contained in the report of the committee, and those submitted by the Attorney General in his annual report, are to be relied upon it appears to me that rank discrimination has been shown in favor of some States and against others. My own State, Georgia, when compared with Tennessee on the north and Florida on the south, furnishes such an example.

I am puzzled to understand why gentlemen framing the bill, and others interested in the administration of justice, should overlook the fact which makes it so evident that Georgia is entitled to relief which the bill does not afford.

By way of comparison, I call your attention briefly to a few conditions existing in Georgia, Florida, and Tennessee. These States now have two district judges each. The bill proposes to give both Tennessee and Florida an additional judge, but makes no provision for Georgia.

The report discloses that in the southern district of Florida there were, on June 30, 1921, 1,589 cases pending. On said date there were pending in the northern district of Georgia 3,845 cases. In the southern district of Florida 808 cases were disposed of last year, while in the northern district of Georgia there were 1,773. On date aforesaid there were pending in the district courts of Florida 1,990 cases; in the district courts of Georgia 6,252—more than three times as many as in Florida—a very natural condition when we remember the population of Georgia is more than three times that of Florida. There were disposed of in the State of Florida last year 1,104 cases; in Georgia, 2,623. The two judges in Georgia disposed of more than twice as many cases as did the two in Florida. Why? Under the provisions of this bill you would give Florida an additional judge and withhold one from Georgia. Why?

The report discloses that in the middle district of Tennessee there were pending on June 30, 1921, 1,019 cases. There were pending in the northern district of Georgia more than three times that number. There were disposed of in said district of Tennessee 252 cases; in the northern district of Georgia during this same period there were disposed of more than seven times as many. On the date aforesaid there were pending in the district courts of Tennessee 2,110 cases; at the same time practically three times this number were pending in Georgia. There are one-half million more population in Georgia than Tennessee, three times as many cases pending on the district court dockets, and more than four times as many were disposed of last year.

Will you further impose on the industrious and efficient judges of Georgia by refusing to relieve them when you grant it to neighbors whom, the facts show, do not so richly deserve it?

The figures cited, and the comparisons mentioned, puzzle one to understand why such rank discrimination should be perpetrated. We are not envious of Tennessee or Florida, but we ask why this discrimination by a Republican Congress in Washington? Is it because of a desire to reward Tennessee for placing itself in the Republican column last year, or for the reason some Republican interests, or individuals, are to be appointed to lucrative positions in Florida?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CABLE].

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Chairman, while this bill deals directly with the appointment of Federal judges, I shall take this opportunity to call the attention of Members of the House to a decision of Federal judges, namely, the so-called Newberry case. The necessity for a new bill defining corrupt practices in the election of Members of Congress has arisen by reason thereof. In 1910 Congress passed an act which simply provides for the report by candidates to Congress of their expenses. In 1911 an amendment to this act limited the amount that could be expended for nomination and for election to the sums indicated by State legislatures, but in no case was the sum to exceed $5,000 for Representatives and $10,000 for Senators. At that time Senators were elected by State legislatures and the law was drawn to apply accordingly. By the seventeenth amendment of the Constitution Senators are now elected by direct vote of the people, and part of the act, section 8, so far as the election of Senators is concerned, was repealed by that amendment. Then when the Supreme Court decided the Newberry case and reversed the conviction in the district court it was based chiefly on the reason that Congress had no authority to pass any law dealing with the primary election of Senators. The effect of the decision is that to-day the corrupt practice act does not apply to Senators. It applies to Representatives in one particular, and that is that a candidate for Representative after election must file his report showing how much his expenditures were in respect to the election. Congress, according to this decision, has jurisdiction to limit the amount a Representative or Senator may expend for his election. The law as to nominations is left to the States. In the States of Illinois, Mississippi, Rhode Island, and Tennessee there is no corrupt practice act at all. In Delaware, Georgia, New York, Pennsylvania, Vermont, and Washington there is no limit upon the amount which can be expended.

In New Jersey the limit is $50,000. In Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, Louisiana, Oklahoma, and Virginia they have a State corrupt practice act which applies to the primary only. Therefore, in view of the decision of the Supreme Court and of the amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in my opinion, it is the duty of Congress to pass a new corrupt practice act that will protect an honest candidate who seeks election to either House of Congress. Purity in politics is necessary for good government. Publicity of expenses of campaigns should be required by Congress. The act as it applies to candidates is almost obsolete. A new law should be passed—one having teeth in it—so that a seat in Congress can not be purchased and all may have an equal opportunity in the election.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON].

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, for a number of years the people of Illinois, particularly southern Illinois, have felt the necessity for an additional judicial district, and at various times bills for that purpose have been pending. I think there are three bills now pending for an additional district in southern Illinois, one of which I filed.

However, from the standpoint of economy, I think this solution of the question is better than the creation of new districts, and I am going to support the bill as the committee has reported it.

For the rest of the time allotted to me I do not care to discuss this bill. I assume that most of the general debate upon the bill has been concluded, and therefore I feel justified in asking the indulgence of the committee on another subject, namely, soldier-benefit legislation. I have here a statement that was published in last Saturday's Washington Star, which I shall hand to the Clerk and ask to have read in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to have the newspaper article referred to read in his time. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the Washington Star, Dec. 3, 1921.]

SEES WHITTLESEY CASE AS SHOCKING REMINDER.

The suicide of Col. Charles W. Whittlesey, leader of the famous "lost battalion," should serve as a "shocking reminder of how the poison of war leaves its trace in men's souls long after the fighting is over," according to John Thomas Taylor, chairman of the legislative committee of the American Legion.

Mr. Taylor, who has been in close touch with the situation surrounding sick and wounded service men since the armistice, declares that thousands of men are in the same mental condition as was Col. Whittlesey—a condition credited with having caused his suicide. The gallant leader's untimely end, Mr. Taylor says, is a summons to the Nation "to save its broken defenders before it is too late."

"Nearly 50,000 mildly insane veterans have passed through our hospitals since the armistice," the Legion official declares in a statement. "Despite our efforts the Government has not yet built one good hospital for the care of these men nor established one good rehabilitation center for their cure. If a highly educated, well-provided-for veteran like Whittlesey surrenders, what may we not fear for the thousands of discouraged, broken-minded, and often destitute men kicked around from pillar to post by their Government?"

More than one-third of the 30,000 disabled veterans now receiving treatment are mentally disabled, according to Mr. Taylor. Of these 10,000 almost 7,500 are scattered through the country in asylums for the criminal and pauper insane.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, this statement which Mr. Taylor has no doubt given wide publicity over the country is neither a fair nor accurate statement of facts. It contains a veiled criticism of the administration of our soldier legislation and of Congress, and is an illustration of criticisms which we have often heard with reference to the treatment accorded by our Government to our soldiers of the World War. Fortunately such criticism does not often come from responsible sources. It has not often come from members of the Legion themselves, who are at all informed on the legislation that has been enacted and who are most deeply interested in the future welfare of the veterans themselves.

I have presented this statement of Mr. Taylor to Col. Forbes, the Director of the Veterans' Bureau, and have asked him to give me a brief statement of the actual facts. Col. Forbes ought to be in possession of the facts as accurately as anyone else in this country, and ought to be in a position where he can make a straight, unbiased statement which will give information not only to the soldiers but to the whole country. He has done so in a communication I have just received from him, and before I am through I will ask that his statement be read and made a part of my remarks.

Such criticism as this suggested to me the idea of making an inquiry into the whole subject of our soldier legislation; this naturally led me to a comparison of what Congress has done for the soldiers of the World War with what was done by the Government for the soldiers of our other wars; and also a comparison of what we have done for the soldiers of our last war with what has been done for their soldiers by the other Governments that were associated with us in the war. The results are interesting and instructive, and I ask your indulgence while I present them briefly.

The first soldiers' pension law ever enacted by any English-speaking government was passed by the Parliament of England in 1592 when Elizabeth was Queen. It was just after the defeat of the Spanish Armada, and history relates that the maimed and disabled soldiers returning from England's wars became vagabonds and beggars and were so numerous and so annoyed the Queen with their importunings as she would go out to take air that the Government was forced to take action, and the result was the enactment of the first soldiers' pension law, which merely provided for their care in an institution which was something of a cross between a hospital and a poorhouse.

Other acts for the relief of disabled soldiers were passed by Parliament until the practice was quite well established in England when our Colonies were struggling to establish themselves in this country.

It is interesting to note that these first soldiers' relief acts were passed by Parliament in order to get rid of what was then considered the annoyance caused by the crippled and maimed soldiers who became vagabonds and beggars.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Does not the gentleman think that the soldiers even in the time of Queen Elizabeth, after having fought for their country, were entitled to some consideration, and that the word "annoyance" ought not to be used with respect to them. I do not know whether the gentleman means to imply that the present demand upon the part of the soldiers here for some consideration is an annoyance to the Government or not.

Mr. DENISON. Oh, not at all.

Mr. LINEBERGER. I agree with the gentleman regarding Mr. Taylor's report, and I am interested in what he has to say.

Mr. DENISON. I was referring to the public attitude with reference to these original acts to show the changed attitudes of the later governments with respect to soldiers. The first pension legislation, as I stated, was enacted by the governments for the purpose of getting rid of what they considered an annoyance on the part of the crippled and maimed soldiers who returned from the wars. That was the motive that prompted the first soldier's benefit legislation in the time of Elizabeth, and as I proceed with my remarks I shall show the different views of governments with respect to their duty toward their soldiers.

The first soldiers' pension legislation ever proposed in this country was prepared and passed by the Colony of Virginia in 1624. But this failed to become a law because it was not ratified by the Government in England. The first pension legislation actually enacted into law in this country was passed by the Plymouth Colony in 1636. Gradually each of the colonial governments passed some sort of crude pension legislation. These laws were all general in their terms, not fixing any amounts to be paid to the soldiers, but leaving the amount of each pension to be determined by local courts and the funds to be raised by local taxation. It is interesting to note that all of the colonial pension legislation was enacted for the purpose of inducing or encouraging the settlers to fight the Indians, and generally these laws provided that no soldier could receive their benefits except such as were so disabled as to become a public charge or an object of charity. No soldier who was merely wounded or injured in defending the Colonies against Indians or against their enemies in other Colonies was considered eligible for a pension unless his injuries or disabilities were of such a nature as to render him incapable of earning a living and make of him a public charge.

As the Revolutionary War approached, and indeed after it was in progress for some time, the Continental Congress failed or refused to enact soldiers' relief legislation until some of the States, particularly Virginia and Pennsylvania, passed laws of their own making liberal provision for disabled soldiers and for the widows of those who were slain.

On August 26, 1776, the Continental Congress passed the first national pension law in the United States. This act allowed half pay for life or during disability to every officer, soldier, or sailor losing a limb in battle or being so disabled in the service of the Government as to render him incapable of earning a living. The administration of the act as well as its enforcement was left entirely to the different State governments. They were to examine the applications of their own soldiers, pay the pension to those who were found qualified, and deduct the amount paid from the State's quota due to the Federal Government. During the progress of the Revolutionary War other soldiers' relief legislation was passed, but it was all passed for the single purpose of encouraging enlistments. Commissioned officers, when disabled so as to be wholly incapable of earning a livelihood, were allowed half pay during life; noncommissioned officers and privates when so disabled as to be wholly incapable of earning a living were allowed $5 a month, with proportionate allowance for partial disability.

We sometimes hear criticism of Congress for its delay in passing legislation. In this connection it may be interesting to know that the Continental Congress during the trying days of the Revolutionary War had under consideration from the beginning of the war until May 15, 1778, about three years, a bill to grant adjusted compensation to the officers and enlisted men of the Army, and this was in the face of repeated warnings from Gen. Washington that unless some such legislation were enacted the Army would lose all of its officers and would become unfit to fight. The bill was only finally passed by a compromise, which limited the half-pay gratuity of the commissioned officers to the period of seven years after the end of the war. It provided a gratuity of one year's full pay, $80, to noncommissioned officers and enlisted men who served faithfully to the end of the war.

This was the first bonus or adjusted compensation bill for soldiers ever passed by Congress. And in this connection I may also say that the original advocate of soldiers' bonus legislation, so far as my investigation has disclosed, was from New Jersey. While this bill was under discussion in Congress in April, 1778, Gov. Livingston, of New Jersey, wrote as follows:

> But in my private judgment I should be totally against the plan of allowing the officers half pay after the war. It is a very pernicious precedent in republican States, will load us with an immense debt, and render the pensioners themselves in a great measure useless to their country. If they must have a compensation, I think they had better have a sum certain to enable them to enter into business and become serviceable to the community.

On August 24, 1780, Congress amended the act of May 15, 1778, by granting half pay for the period of seven years to the widows of the officers who had died or should thereafter die in the service from the result of wounds or injuries received in the service, the payment to begin from the time of the officer's death, and if there was no widow surviving, or in case of her death or remarriage, the half pay was to go to any orphan child of the deceased. This was the first national pension law of the United States for the benefit of the widows and orphans of the soldiers, and the benefits were limited to the widows and orphans of commissioned officers.

In March, 1783, after prolonged discussion in the Congress and much agitation among the soldiers and all over the country, Congress passed the commutation act, which provided that in lieu of the half pay for life the officers should receive five years' full pay in money or in securities bearing interest at 6 per cent, as Congress should find most convenient.

This was the first adjusted compensation law providing for a cash settlement ever passed by Congress, so far as I have been able to ascertain. It created a profound impression among the different States. Protests were sent to Congress by the States of Massachusetts and Connecticut, and a bitter agitation started against Congress from all over the country, which threatened the dissolution of the Confederacy. Washington championed vigorously the cause of the soldiers and defended the acts of the Continental Congress in granting this gratuity to the soldiers and the commutation to the officers. It is interesting to note the arguments which he made in favor of the legislation. In one of his letters he said:

> The resolutions of Congress now alluded to are undoubtedly as absolutely binding upon the United States as the most solemn act of confederation or legislation. The half pay and commutation ought not to be regarded in the odious light of a pension. It was a part of the officers' hire. I may be allowed to say it was the price of their blood and of your independence; it is, therefore, more than a common debt; it is a debt of honor; it can never be considered as a pension or gratuity, nor be canceled until it is fairly discharged.

We have all observed, no doubt, how Washington's arguments of 140 years ago defending the adjusted compensation acts for the soldiers and officers of the Revolutionary War are repeated to-day by those who are urging adjusted compensation legislation for the soldiers of this war.

The commutation act of 1783 providing commutation of the half pay for life allowed to officers, and the act of 1778 providing one year's full pay after discharge for enlisted men were never fully carried into effect, because, necessarily, they depended for their execution upon the action of the States themselves and some of the States refused to act. Moreover, many of the payments were made in scrip which was never redeemed. The result was that the agitation continued until 1828, 45 years after the close of the war, when Congress, in the administration of John Quincy Adams, passed a bill granting full pay for life, beginning March 3, 1826, to the surviving Revolutionary officers, and also full pay for life for noncommissioned officers and enlisted men who enlisted in the war and served until its end.

On April 24, 1816, Congress amended the pension law, increasing the rate of pension for invalid private soldiers from $5 to $8 per month.

So, from the beginning of the Revolutionary War until the act of April 24, 1816, over 40 years, no wounded or disabled soldier who fought to win our independence received a pension of more than $5 per month, and that only in case of disability to such an extent as to render him unable to perform manual labor.

In 1818 the Treasury of the Government was overflowing with money as the result of revenues received from the rapidly increasing imports, and Congress again amended the pension law so as to provide that every officer who served as much as nine months or longer at any period of the Revolutionary War could receive a pension of $20 per month and every noncommissioned officer and private $8 per month during life. No person under this act was eligible to receive a pension unless by reason of his reduced circumstances in life he was in need of assistance and support from his country.

This was the first service pension law ever enacted by Congress and was the precedent for all subsequent service pension legislation.

So, from the beginning of the Revolutionary War until 1818, or about 42 years, no soldier who served in the war for independence was allowed a pension for any reason except for injuries or disabilities incurred in the service.

From the beginning of the Revolutionary War until July 4, 1836, 53 years after the close of the war, no widow of an enlisted soldier who served in the war for independence was ever allowed a pension. By the act of July 4, 1836, and several amendatory acts, widows of Revolutionary soldiers were allowed a pension of, at first, $4 per month, and later $8 a month, and were never allowed more than that until the act of 1886, over 100 years after the war, when the pensions of a few of the surviving widows of that war were increased to $12 per month.

Soldiers of the War of 1812 who suffered total disability from wounds received in action were pensioned at $5 a month until the act of 1816, which increased their pensions, as well as those of the soldiers of the Revolutionary War, to $8 per month.

So no soldier of the War of 1812 was pensioned for any cause except for disability incurred in service until 1871, about 60 years after the war. In 1871 Congress passed a service pension law for the surviving soldiers of the War of 1812, which granted to all the surviving soldiers of that war who served 60 days the sum of $8 per month during life.

Until the act of 1816 no widow of a soldier of the War of 1812 received a pension. By that act widows of the soldiers of that war who were killed in the service were allowed half pay or $48 a year, $4 per month.

By the act of 1871 the pension of widows of soldiers of the War of 1812 who died from the result of wounds received or diseases contracted in the service was increased to $8 per month during life; and the act of 1886, over 70 years after the close of the war, increased the pensions of such widows to $12 per month.

No soldier of the Mexican War received a pension, except such as were wounded or disabled in the service, until 1887, 40 years after the close of the war. Those who were totally disabled as the result of the service received but $8 per month.

In 1887 service pensions amounting to $8 per month to all soldiers of the Mexican War who were either 62 years of age or who were subject to disability or dependency were granted by act of Congress.

In 1893, 45 years after the close of the Mexican War, Congress increased the pension of the Mexican War veterans to $12 per month. But this increase only applied to such as were wholly disabled from manual labor and in such destitute circumstances that $8 per month was insufficient to provide them with the necessaries of life. Subsequent acts allowed the Mexican War veterans a pension of $12 per month without conditions.

In 1907, 60 years after the close of the Mexican War, age and service pensions were granted to those who served 60 days or more and were honorably discharged, the rate being $12 per month for those 62 years of age, $15 per month for those 70 years of age, and $20 per month for those 75 years of age.

In 1912, 65 years after the close of the war, the pensions of Mexican War veterans were increased to $30 per month. Finally, in 1920, 72 years after the close of the Mexican War, the pensions of Mexican War veterans who served 60 days were increased to $50 per month, and in cases of complete dependency, $72 per month.

Widows of soldiers killed in the Mexican War received half pay, or $48 per year, for life, and it was never increased above that amount, $4 per month, until 1887, 40 years after the close of the war, when it was increased to $8 per month, and it remained $8 per month until the act of 1908, 60 years after the close of the war, when their pensions were increased to $12 per month. In 1916, Mexican War widows' pensions were increased to $20 per month, and this was in 1920 increased to $30 per month.

On July 14, 1862, Congress passed what is known as the general law pension system for the benefit of soldiers of the Civil War, and all subsequent wars, and their dependents. Only those soldiers who incurred disability in the service as a direct result of the performance of their military duty were entitled to pensions. Pensions allowed to soldiers of the Civil War under this law ranged from $30 per month for lieutenant colonels and all officers of higher rank to $8 per month for noncommissioned officers and privates. Pensions for Civil War veterans remained substantially the same under this law until the act of June 27, 1890, when the first Civil War service pension law was enacted.

So no soldier of the Civil War who was not injured or disabled by his military service received any pension from the Government until the act of 1890, 25 years after the close of the war; and those who were totally disabled in the service only received $8 per month in the case of privates and $30 per month in the case of lieutenant colonels and those of higher rank.

Under the service pension act of June 27, 1890, all soldiers of the Civil War who served 90 days or more and who were suffering from a mental or physical disability of a permanent character, not the result of their own vicious habits, which incapacitated them from the performance of manual labor in such a degree as to render them unable to earn a support were entitled to receive a pension not exceeding $12 per month and not less than $6 per month, according to the degree of their inability to earn their support. This act was a combination service and disability act. Under it all who served 90 days and who were unable to earn their support on account of mental or physical disability were entitled to the pension, and it was not necessary that their disability should be of service origin. These rates were increased in 1907 to $12 per month for those 62 years of age, $15 per month for those 70 years of age, and $20 per month for those 75 years of age or over.

On May 11, 1912, Congress passed the act known as the age and service act, under which soldiers of the Civil War were pensioned in varying amounts according to their age and the length of their service, ranging from $13 per month for those who were 62 years of age and had served 90 days to $30 per month for those who were 75 years of age and had served 3 years.

Finally the act of May 1, 1920, known as the Fuller Act, allows to all veterans of the Civil War who served 90 days or more, without regard to age or length of service, $50 per month, and in case of physical or mental disability to such an extent as to require the services of an attendant, $72 per month.

So the highest pension paid to a private soldier of the Civil War who was totally disabled in line of duty, for 25 years after the war was $8 per month; and the highest now paid to a soldier of the Civil War under the general pension law since the act of May, 1920, is $50 per month, except in cases where the soldier requires the assistance of an attendant, in which case it is $72 per month.

Widows of soldiers of the Civil War who were killed or died by reason of wounds received or diseases contracted in the service were pensioned at the same rate that the soldier would have received had he been totally disabled, which in the case of privates was $8 per month.

The act of 1862 also provided that in case there was no widow the pension should be paid to the child or children until they reached the age of 16 years, and if the deceased left no widow or children then the mother or orphan sisters were entitled to the pension. This was the first pension act in the history of our Government under which mothers and orphan sisters of the soldiers were provided for.

In 1886 the pension of widows of the Civil War veterans was increased to $12 per month. So that no widow of a veteran of the Civil War whose death resulted from wounds received or disease contracted in the service received as much as $12 per month until over 20 years after the close of the war, and their pensions remained at $12 per month until the act of 1916, by which it was increased to $20 per month.

The act of 1890, which provided the first service and disability pension, also allowed the first pensions to widows of Civil War veterans whose death was not the result of injuries received or diseases contracted in the service. Under that act the widow was entitled to a pension if her husband served 90 days or more and was honorably discharged and thereafter died from other than service causes, leaving the widow without other means of support than her daily labor.

So that it was not until 25 years after the close of the war that the widows of Civil War veterans could receive a pension except upon proof that the soldier's death was of service origin.

In 1912 pensions of widows of the Civil War were increased to $20 per month and by the act of May 1, 1920, they were still further increased to $30 per month.

Veterans of the Spanish-American War who served 90 days or more and were honorably discharged are, since the act of June 5, 1920, entitled to receive not more than $30 per month and not less than $12 per month proportioned to the degree of disability to earn a support.

Widows of the veterans of the Spanish-American War have never been allowed a pension more than $12 per month and prior to the passage of the Sells Act in 1920 they were never allowed that except in cases where the soldier's death was due to injuries received or disease contracted in the service.

In addition to the general disability pension laws which I have thus briefly reviewed there were special provisions made for special disabilities incurred in line of duty.

From 1864 to 1872 soldiers of the Civil War were allowed $25 per month in case of the loss of both hands, both feet, or both eyes.

From 1872 to 1874 they were allowed by law for such injuries $31.25 a month.

From 1874 to 1878 for such injuries $50 per month.

From 1878 to 1890, $72 per month.

And finally the rate allowed for the loss of both hands or both feet or both eyes was fixed at $100 per month, which is the rate now allowed.

I have reviewed briefly the pension legislation of our Government passed for the benefit of our soldiers of all wars prior to the World War and their dependents. I will insert here a table showing the total amount paid out by the Government in pensions for each of the different wars in which our country has been involved:

Table showing total amounts paid to soldiers of the various wars in which the United States has been engaged from 1790 to 1920, inclusive.

Revolutionary War	$70,000,000
War of 1812	46,094,572
Indian wars	20,017,919
Mexican War	54,471,001
Civil War	5,749,030,456
War with Spain and Philippine insurrection	76,007,333
Regular Establishment	57,302,421
Unclassified	16,508,447
World War	99,402
Total	6,089,531,551

So, Mr. Chairman, our pension system has been a tremendous burden. It would be interesting, if it were possible of ascertainment, to know just what part of this vast expenditure has gone where it was deserved and needed, and what part has gone where it was not deserved and not needed.

Pension systems always have been and always will be abused. Governments must be grateful to those who fight their battles; they must be liberal with those who sacrifice for them. No government could or would deserve to long endure that would not well reward its defenders.

But the history of our pension legislation is an indictment of the system. Laws granting or increasing pensions have been passed or defeated without regard to the real needs of the soldiers themselves.

They have been passed at times because there were abundant funds in the Treasury or for purely political reasons, and they have been delayed or even defeated through sheer blindness to the necessities and the just claims of the soldiers.

These facts confronted Congress when we were drawn into the World War in April, 1917. Most of us here realized the vastness of our undertaking and the colossal costs and losses it would bring. I think Congress took a most wise and commendable course when it threw aside and abandoned our antiquated pension system and enacted the comprehensive, equitable, and patriotic plan of dealing with our soldiers of the World War and their dependents in the manner provided by the War Risk Insurance act and its subsequent amendments.

If we can but have the wisdom and the courage to resist the temptation to return to the old inadequate and abused pension system, and by perfecting amendments to and proper administration of the present War Risk Insurance law, deal justly and fairly with our veterans of the World War and their dependents, we shall have done a worthy service both to the country and to those who joined the colors.

Now, what benefits has Congress provided by legislation for the soldiers of our last war?

First, we have provided a simple but adequate system of compensation for all who suffered any injury or disability or contracted any disease in the service, the amount of such compensation to be determined not by the soldier's poverty or affluence, but by his proven degree of disability and by the number and dependency of his family.

If the soldier is single and suffered a temporary total disability, he gets $80 a month. If he has a wife, he receives $90; with a wife and one child, $95; with a wife and two children, $100; with a wife and two children and two dependent parents, $120; and in addition to these amounts he receives an additional $20 per month for nurse hire where it is necessary. For permanent total disability he receives $100 a month, and $20 additional for a nurse if necessary. For double total disability, $200 per month, with $20 additional for a nurse if necessary.

For less than total disability the compensation is determined according to the degree of his disability as ascertained by medical examination, and may be increased or decreased as his condition changes.

Contrast this compensation with the $8 per month which was all that was allowed the soldiers of the Civil War who were disabled in the struggle to save the Union for 25 years after the war, or contrast it with the pensions that are now, 60 years after the Civil War, allowed to the veterans of that war—namely, $50 per month, or in cases of absolute helplessness, $72 per month.

Contrast it with the pensions allowed to the soldiers of the Spanish-American War, which for more than 20 years after the close of that war were only $30 per month for commissioned officers of the rank of lieutenant colonel and higher rank who were totally disabled, and $8 per month for noncommissioned officers and privates who were totally disabled. Veterans of the Spanish-American War now are limited to a maximum of $30 per month and a minimum of $12 per month, depending upon the degree of disability.

In the second place, the compensation allowed to the widow and dependent children of the soldiers of the World War is very liberal as compared with similar allowances to the dependents of soldiers of our other wars.

If the soldier was killed or died from wounds received or diseases contracted in the service, his widow receives $25 per month for life, or until her remarriage. A widow and one child receive $35 per month; a widow and two children, $42.50 per month; a widow and three children, $47.50 per month; a widow and four children, $52.50 per month.

If the soldier left no widow and left one child, it is allowed $20 per month; two children, $30 per month; three children, $40 per month; four children, $45 per month; five children, $50 per month.

And in addition to these amounts, if the soldier left a dependent mother or father, $20 per month, or if he left a dependent mother and father, $30 per month, all in addition to the family allowances.

So that Congress has provided compensation for dependent families of the soldiers of the World War amounting to from $25 per month in the case of a widow only to $80 per month, depending upon the number of dependents. We have appropriated $397,150,000 for the payment of compensation claims alone since 1918.

Contrast these allowances with the fact that no pension at all was allowed to widows of the soldiers of the Revolutionary War until many years after the close of the war, and then their pension was only $4 per month; and widows of soldiers of the Revolutionary War were not allowed as much as $8 per month until 53 years after the close of the war, and their pensions were only increased to $12 per month in 1886, over 100 years after the close of the war.

Contrast this allowance also with the pension allowed to widows of the Civil War, which was only $8 a month for over 20 years after the war. In 1886 this was increased to $12 per month, and so remained until 1916, when it was increased to $20 per month, and even now it is only $30.

And widows of the Spanish-American War veterans have never been pensioned more than $12 per month, and until the Sells Act of 1920 they could not receive any pension except in cases where the soldier died from injury received in the service.

In the third place, for the first time in our history Congress provided war-risk insurance, so that every man who entered the service could secure at cost insurance for the benefit of his family to the extent of $10,000. The beneficiaries of those who carried as much as $10,000 insurance and who were killed or died as the result of their services receive $57.50 a month for a period of 20 years, in addition to the compensation which they receive from the Government. And if the soldier suffers permanent total disability so as to render him incapable of earning a living, his insurance is payable to him the same as it would be to his beneficiaries in case of his death, at the rate of $57.50 per month on a policy of $10,000. We have appropriated $53,196,906 for the payment of insurance claims.

In the fourth place, Congress has provided by law for as complete a system of physical rehabilitation for discharged, injured, or disabled soldiers as could be obtained. No amount of money has been spared in providing the very best medical treatment and hospitalization for all soldiers who suffer from any injury or disease of service origin. They are sent to a Government hospital and given the very best medical care and attention that the Government can provide until they are cured or found to be incurable, all at Government expense; and moreover, as soon as they are sent to the hospital for treatment they are at once rated as temporary total disability and their compensation is increased accordingly. Physical rehabilitation or hospitalization such as the Government is now furnishing to the discharged soldiers of the World War was never furnished by the Government to the soldiers of any other war. We have appropriated for this purpose the sum of $309,293,040 since 1918.

In this connection I now wish to read the letter from Col. Forbes in answer to the published statement of Mr. Taylor that was read a moment ago:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF WAR RISK INSURANCE,
Washington, December 7, 1921.

Hon. E. E. DENISON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. DENISON: Acknowledging receipt of your letter of December 5, 1921, inviting attention to a statement issued by Mr. John Thomas Taylor, chairman of the legislative committee of the American Legion, and published in the Washington Star of December 3 under the title "Sees Whittlesey Case as Shocking Reminder," and requesting a statement from me confirming or denying the correctness of Mr. Taylor's statements, I am very glad to comply with your request, and I am outlining below a résumé of the situation as found by this bureau after a careful analysis of the situation.

The total number of neuropsychiatric cases admitted to hospitals up to the present time is approximately 29,000, this figure including a considerable number who have been admitted, discharged, and readmitted from one to many times, and including also under the broad term of neuropsychiatric cases the insanities, the psychoneuroses (neurasthenia, hysteria, etc.), feeble-mindedness, constitutional psychopathic states, defectives, epilepsy, etc. The mildly insane veterans referred to by Mr. Taylor are probably meant to include all of the types referred to above, as well as such cases which react abnormally, even though to a slight degree, to the difficulty of social adjustment, a necessary burden upon ex-service men returning to civilian life at the conclusion of the World War. Of this type of case there are hospitalized at the present time 5,540 cases, 1,266 of which are in various civilian and State hospitals under contract with the United States Veterans' Bureau, leaving a balance of 4,274 who are being provided for in appropriate governmental institutions.

The total number of ex-service men and women in all hospitals for all cases at the present time is between 29,000 and 30,000. From this it may be seen that the neuropsychiatric cases at the present time are something less than one-fifth of the total cases receiving treatment. Careful estimates, made by trained medical officers of the several governmental services, indicate that the maximum number of neuropsychiatric cases requiring hospitalization by the United States Veterans' Bureau will be approximately 9,500 in number, and that the peak load of hospitalization with reference to this type of case will be reached in all probability during the coming spring.

The termination of the World War and the passage by Congress of the war risk insurance act placed immediately a burden on the governmental facilities provided to carry on this work, tremendous in its size and with entirely inadequate hospital and other medical facilities for the proper care and treatment of these wards of the Government. In common with other types of construction, the building of hospitals was practically at a standstill during the war period, and after the war the hospital situation throughout the country was inadequate in bed capacity to take care of the needs of the civilian population, without consideration of the needs of the disabilities of the war veterans. Through expansion of existing governmental hospital facilities, making use of hospitals in cantonments, securing and remodeling suitable private properties obtained under lease, the number of hospital beds through these various methods has been expanded until at the present time there are something over 28,000 governmental beds available for the treatment of our beneficiaries, of which number approximately 5,500 are for the exclusive care and treatment of neuropsychiatric cases.

In March, 1921, Congress, through the agency of the Langley bill, appropriated the sum of $18,600,000 to provide for a hospital program for the care of disabled war veterans. The handling of this sum of money was placed under the Secretary of the Treasury, who, through the agency of an advisory body of prominent and nationally known physicians, has given careful consideration to the needs for additional hospital facilities throughout the entire United States, and which advisory committee has allocated the sum appropriated, providing for increased bed facilities of existing hospitals by the number of approximately 4,500 beds and providing for new construction and purchase of hospital facilities with an additional bed capacity of approximately 2,750. Of these projects, approximately 2,650 beds are for mental and nervous cases. As yet only one of these hospitals provided by the Langley bill has become available up to the present time. It is expected, however, that in the next six to eight months the others will be available for use. The facilities now provided, and which will become available within the next several months, will very largely carry the burden of the maximum load of neuropsychiatric cases needing treatment in hospitals. The additional number of this type of case for which governmental beds have not or will not be provided will be taken care of through selected State institutions of the better character. It has been necessary from the beginning of the work to use existing facilities, particularly State institutions, for the care of frankly insane, but in carrying out this measure the greatest care possible has been exercised to eliminate the institutions of inferior or questionable character or whose facilities are of inadequate order. It is true that the pauper and criminal insane are hospitalized in practically all of the State institutions, but this type of case is, as a rule, segregated and kept separate and apart from the general patients of the institutions. The beneficiaries of this bureau hospitalized in these institutions have in a large percentage of cases been grouped in separate wards and, where possible, in separate buildings. Many of the facilities thus used are of high type modern institutions, and it is believed that our patients on the whole have received very excellent care and treatment in good surroundings.

With reference to the statement that not one good rehabilitation center has been established, let me advise you that there are in existence training centers for the rehabilitation of ex-service men at Nauvoo, Ill.; Pascagoula, Miss.; Port Jefferson, N. Y.; Waynesville, N. C.; Pocono Pines, Pa., and two rehabilitation centers are in course of preparation at Prescott, Ariz., and at Meramec Heights, Mo. On the 1st of December the United States Veterans' Bureau vocational school No. 1 was opened at Chillicothe, Ohio, and is now engaged in training and rehabilitating ex-soldiers. The bureau has further plans with respect to training centers.

It should be realized that the hospital program for the care of veterans has been limited by congressional authority. Until March 4, 1921, those charged with the care of the World War veterans were limited to utilizing existing governmental facilities, such as taking over ex-Army cantonments, extending, altering, or repairing existing institutions, and leasing properties which might be converted to hospital use. There were no funds for the purpose of hospital construction prior to the passage of the Langley bill of March 4, 1921, already referred to. That bill was for the purpose of constructing hospitals for the care of World War veterans, but placed the control of the funds and the location of the hospitals in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau having no authority in the matter whatsoever.

Since the passage of the act of August 9, 1921 (the Sweet bill), it is true that the United States Veterans' Bureau has been consulted in the location of hospitals, but the control of the method of constructing such hospitals is still vested in the Secretary of the Treasury and not with the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau.

From the foregoing it will be seen that with reference to the hospitalization and medical care and treatment of beneficiaries Mr. Taylor's statements are in some cases not true, in others greatly exaggerated and calculated to give an impression that the United States Veterans' Bureau has been neglecting its responsibilities. This is not the fact. The United States Veterans' Bureau has definite programs and plans for meeting its obligations for the care and rehabilitation of veterans of the World War, but has been limited in carrying this work out by the facts already stated in this letter. Its ability to cope with the situation in the future will largely depend on congressional action from time to time. In short, the problems connected with the care and rehabilitation of World War veterans has received and is receiving most earnest consideration by this bureau. Considering the handicaps which have been placed on the bureau in meeting its problems, it is believed it has utilized the machinery which has been available to the best advantage.

Very truly, yours,

C. R. FORBES,
Director United States Veterans' Bureau.

I think that sufficiently answers Mr. Taylor. Congress has always promptly responded to all that has been asked for our wounded or disabled veterans.

In the fifth place, we have provided for vocational rehabilitation for any soldier who by reason of injuries or disabilities received or contracted in the service has been rendered incapable of pursuing his regular vocation, regardless of the extent of his injury; if they are of such a nature as to prevent or even handicap him in the pursuit of his accustomed vocation, the Government furnishes him books, tools, and equipment free, sends him to an institution where his tuition and expenses are paid, and reeducates or rehabilitates him in some useful vocation until his course has been completed and he is pronounced rehabilitated; and during the period of his vocational training the Government pays him at the rate of from $80 to $150 per month, according to the number of his dependents. Vocational rehabilitation was never provided by the Government for the soldiers of any other war.

Congress has up to this time appropriated $249,000,000 to carry on the work of vocational rehabilitation, and the Government is now giving vocational education to 90,000 veterans.

I now wish to make some comparison between the treatment given our soldiers of the World War and that given the soldiers by other countries with which we were associated in the war.

First, as to rates of pay during service. I insert here a statement giving a comparison of the rates of pay in the various armies. This was furnished me by the Acting Chief of the Finance Department of the Army.

It shows that the United States paid her enlisted men $30 a month, and in case of overseas service $33 per month; Canada, $33 per month; Great Britain, $11.40 per month; Germany, $3 per month; France, $1.50 per month; Austria-Hungary, $1.96 per month; Japan, $1.78 per month; Italy, $1.58 per month. Only two countries paid their soldiers more than the United States. These were Australia, $43.50 per month, and New Zealand, $36.60 per month. Comparative rates of pay for corporals, sergeants, and sergeants major will be found in the following table:

COMPARISON OF RATES OF PAY IN VARIOUS ARMIES.

Rates of pay per month, effective during the war, for privates and certain grades of noncommissioned officers in the infantry branch of service are shown. Food and clothing allowances are very largely the same for all armies.

[1] 50 per cent disability based in all cases on amounts paid for total permanent disability.
[2] A bonus of from $36 Canada dollars to $120 is paid in addition during first year only.
[3] In almost all instances these amounts are only paid up to age 18.
[4] No provision.
[5] It is stated that the above payment ($367.90) on a $5,000 policy is the maximum obtainable. This is not substantiated. It is also payable for total permanent disability.
[6] One payment.
[7] This insurance is also payable in the event of total permanent disability.
[8] The same as Great Britain.

NOTE.—Exchange rates used: Pound, $3.62; shilling, $0.181; Canada dollar, $0.90; franc, $0.0785; lira, $0.044.

It shows that for permanent total disability the United States paid $1,200 per year; Italy, $55.44; France, $314; Canada, $540; and Great Britain, $376.48.

If the man who was permanently totally disabled had a wife and four children, the United States pays $1,200 per year; Italy, $65.34; France, $314; Great Britain, $710.60. Canada is the only country which pays more in cases of that kind, namely, $1,317.60.

Where the disability of the soldier is such that he requires the attention of a nurse, the Government of the United States pays $240 per year additional, Italy pays nothing, France nothing, Great Britain nothing; Canada pays $675 additional.

This table shows that in case of death, where the soldier leaves a widow alone, the Government of the United States pays the widow $300 a year; Italy, $27.22; France, $54.95; Great Britain, $188.24; Canada, $432, or $132 more than the United States. And where the deceased soldier left a wife and four children the United States pays $630 compensation per year; Italy pays $37.62; France, $149.15; Great Britain, $461.19; and Canada, $939.60, or $309.60 more per year than the United States.

Great Britain and France made no provision for life insurance in addition to compensation for her soldiers. The maximum life insurance provision for soldiers of the United States is $57.50 per month, or $690 a year. That for Italy is $22 a year; that for Canada $331.11 per year.

An analysis of this table and of others which I have seen shows that the United States exceeds all other nations in the compensation allowed to its soldiers in the World War for total permanent disability, with the exception only of the Dominion of Canada, and there only when the disabled soldier has a wife and four children, in which case he receives $1,317.60 as against $1,200 received by the American soldier, and where the soldier has a wife and three children, in which case he receives $1,209.60 as against $1,200 received by the American soldier.

The table also shows that the United States has dealt more liberally than all other nations in the payment of death benefits to the widows and children of her soldiers of the World War with the single exception of the Dominion of Canada, where the payments run something larger than payments to our soldiers.

For the first time in our history we also made provision for compulsory allotments from the soldiers' pay in favor of his family, and for separation allowances by the Government for the benefit of the families of soldiers while they were absent in the service. We never did this for the soldiers of any of our former wars. Congress has appropriated the sum of $298,615,000 for this purpose.

The table which I am filing and making a part of my remarks shows a comparison of the separation allowances made by Great Britain, Canada, France, Italy, and the United States.

Where the soldier had a wife the compulsory allotment and the separation allowance by the Government together amounted per year to $360 for the American soldier. It amounted to $11.24 for the Italian soldier; $50.14 for the French soldier; $202.36 for the British soldier, and $202.36 for the Canadian soldier. If the soldier had a wife and six children the compulsory allotment and allowance by the United States was $780 per year; by Italy, $44.97; by France, $179.08 per year; by Great Britain, $324.71 per year; and by the Dominion of Canada, $324.71 per year.

So that the United States made far more liberal provisions for the maintenance and care and support of the families of our soldiers during their service in the Army than did any other Government engaged in the World War.

I have here a chart showing the war gratuities paid by the United States and foreign Governments. It was prepared by the Veterans' Bureau, and I wish to ask permission to insert it as part of my remarks. It gives a comparative statement of the war gratuities paid by Italy, France, Australia, Great Britain, Canada, and the United States to their soldiers who did not go overseas as well as to those who did go overseas:

NOTE.—All gratuities are figured on a prewar normal basis; if average August, 1921, rate of exchange were used, the following deductions should be made to equitably compare with the United States: Italy (lira), 77 per cent deduction; France (franc), 60 per cent deduction; Great Britain (pound), 25 per cent deduction; Canada (dollar), 10 per cent deduction.

The only gratuity paid by the United States, of course, without regard to whether the service was overseas or not, and without regard to the rank of the soldier, was $60 in all cases, and this cost us the total sum of $256,239,900.

Italy paid a cash gratuity to her private soldiers of from $34.74 to $63.69, depending upon the length of service. France, $74.31 to $187.21; Great Britain, $24.30 to $82.62; Canada, $70 to $300, all in cases where there was no overseas duty.

Where the soldier served overseas the gratuity paid by the different nations to the private soldiers was as follows: Italy, $34.74 to $63.69; France, $82.99 to $233.58; Australia, $32.81 to $98.42; Great Britain, $24.30 to $140.90; Canada, $280 to $600; United States, $60.

The gratuities paid to officers of higher grades and ranks differ about in the same proportion, with the exception of the United States, which paid a flat gratuity of $60 for all ranks. Italy paid her major generals a gratuity of $369.92 to $852.42; Great Britain, $2,430 to $7,290; Canada, $744 to $2,392; and in case of overseas duty Italy has paid major generals a gratuity of $369.92 to $852.42; Australia, $250.61 to $751.82; Great Britain, $2,430 to $7,290; Canada, $2,928 to $4,758; United States, $60.

The record shows, then, and the people of the country ought to understand it, that our Government has dealt far more liberally with the soldiers of the World War and their dependent families than we have ever dealt with the soldiers of any of our former wars. We have been far more liberal with them in their rate of pay, in the benefits allowed to the families during the service of the soldiers, in the benefits provided for the widow and children in case of the death or total disability of the soldier, in the compensation allowed the soldiers in case of partial or total disability or disease contracted in line of duty, in the insurance provided, and in hospitalization and physical and vocational rehabilitation provided by the Government for those who were injured in the service. The record further shows that the United States has been more liberal than any other nation engaged in the World War, with the exception of Australia and New Zealand, in the rate of pay for the soldiers during their service, and more liberal than any other nation in the allotment and allowances provided for their families during their service, in the benefits allowed to their widows in cases of death, or to the soldiers in case of permanent total disability, and in the compensation allowed to the family of the soldier in case of death or permanent total disability where there is a widow and children surviving, with the single exception of the Dominion of Canada to which I have referred.

We have appropriated altogether since 1918 for soldier benefit legislation the sum of $1,462,845,326.

But, Mr. Chairman, we must frankly admit we have been less liberal in the payment of adjusted compensation than have most of the allied nations. Great Britain, Canada, Australia, France, and Italy have not only been more liberal with their commissioned officers—Great Britain paying in the case of major generals from $2,430 to $7,290; Canada, $2,928 to $3,758; Australia, $250.61 to $751.82; Italy, $369.92 to $352.42; and the United States, $60—but they have all, with the possible exception of Italy, paid more to their privates, Canada paying as much as from $280 to $600.

I do not think we can afford to let the record remain so. We may well be proud of all else we have done for our soldiers. While the war burdens are heavy, are we not as able to pay as the nations associated with us, who bore the burdens of war for four bitter years?

There is a feeling, a persistent conviction, with the majority of our ex-service men, I believe, that the Government ought to adjust the compensation allowed them.

This feeling is due largely, I think, not so much to the small pay they who went to the front received as to large and greatly increased wages those received who remained at home, especially those for whose greatly increased pay and back pay the Government was directly or indirectly responsible. Whether or not the high wages and the bonuses paid here at home during the war was wise or necessary does not answer the question. The fact remains and will not be forgotten by those who made sacrifices with the colors until there has been some sort of an adjustment of their pay.

This problem confronts us here and now, and I think we ought to meet it as soon as possible. I think Congress ought to pass an adjusted compensation bill that will deal justly with the soldiers and fairly with those who must largely bear the burden. And I think it will cost the country immeasurably less to do it now than it will if it is delayed indefinitely. History repeats itself and we can not change facts by closing our eyes or stopping our ears to them.

There is not one of us, I am sure, who is not proud of the service and of the splendid record of those who served the country both at home and on the fields of France and Flanders. We want them to feel contented through life. We want them to be proud of their country as well as of their service. And above all we want them to feel that their country has dealt justly with them.

Just as certain as we do not do so, we will as surely be driven sooner or later to refuge in the old, abused, and inadequate pension system. If that door is ever opened, generations yet unborn will pay the price of our reluctance and our folly.

I do not want our Government to ever revert to the pension system for the soldiers of this war. I do not see how anyone who is at all familiar with the history of our pension legislation could do so. Congress can remove what might be the most urgent excuse or reason that could hereafter be urged for that, in my humble judgment, by dealing justly with our soldiers now, so they may always feel that the Government has at least fairly compensated them for their services.

We can not satisfy all of them, of course. There are some who always will look upon military duty as labor for rather than service to their country.

But we can satisfy most of them if we try. And we must remember that those who went into the service were the best we had. They will in peace love and honor and serve well their country, for which in war they were willing to fight so well.

One hundred and forty-four years ago Congress, on the advice of Gen. Washington, adjusted the compensation of all those who fought that we might be free by granting five years' full pay for all officers and one year's full pay—$80—to all enlisted men. It is true that adjustment was made to encourage or induce men to enlist and fight until the finish.

Now it will be paid, if at all, as an act of justice deferred through the stress of circumstances.

But then our Government was young and poor and weak. Now we are grown great and wealthy and strong. Should we do less now than we did then?

I confess I do not know the financing problem involved. But notwithstanding this and notwithstanding the splendid and liberal provisions we have made as compared with those for our former wars and those of other countries in this war, let us finish our good work here by adjusting as soon as possible the compensation for those who fought or were ready to fight the good fight for us. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the Committee on the Judiciary, of which I am a member, is as free from party influence, as free from partisanship, as any other committee of the House. I regret it as an unfortunate thing, however, that during any administration, whether it be Democratic or Republican, such an addition to the Federal judiciary as is here proposed ever in the judgment of the party in control may be deemed necessary.

Reference to this particular bill, investigation as to the necessity, the recommendation as to necessity, comes very largely from those connected with the judiciary. It is unfortunate that during the last Congress, of the last administration, when a number of these bills were presented to the Judiciary Committee for consideration, some few of them presented to the House for action, whatever may have been the reason which prevented, the fact is they were not permitted to be enacted into law. Whether or not the fact that, if enacted, a Democratic President would have made some of the appointments controlled that determination I am not prepared to say. But it is a fact that a bill was offered giving an additional judge for the State of Arizona. That bill was not permitted to pass, but of these judgeships one is for the State of Arizona. A bill was offered for the northern district of California in 1919. A judgeship for that district is included in this bill. The former bill, providing for the State of California, failed. The same is true of the State of Florida, for the northern district of Illinois, for the eastern district of Michigan, for the State of Minnesota, for the State of Montana, for the eastern district of Oklahoma, and for the middle district of Tennessee. Those bills, each offered in due form, with the conditions similar to the conditions which it is claimed necessitate increase now, were not acted upon by this Congress. At that time we had a Democratic President who, I assume, would have appointed some Democrat to this position. Congress was then in the control of the Republican Party, but the appointive power was Democratic. Now we have a Republican Congress, a Republican President, and one great bill is brought into the House upon an investigation conducted by the Attorney General, by members of the Federal judiciary, proposing an increase at one time by 22 members of the Federal judiciary of the Nation. Mr. Chairman, this action with reference to the Federal judiciary, at least in so far as appearances are concerned, is not in line with the will of the Nation that its Federal judiciary shall never become involved in consideration of party expediency.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the district of Massachusetts, two; for the eastern district of New York, one; for the southern district of New York, two; for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, one; for the western district of Pennsylvania, one; for the eastern district of Virginia, one; for the northern district of Texas, one; for the southern district of Florida, one; for the eastern district of Michigan, one; for the northern district of Ohio, one; for the middle district of Tennessee, one; for the northern district of Illinois, one; for the eastern district of Illinois, one; for the district of Minnesota, one; for the eastern district of Missouri, one; for the western district of Missouri, one; for the eastern district of Oklahoma, one; for the district of Montana, one; for the northern district of California, one; for the southern district of California, one; and for the district of Arizona, one. Said judges shall be residents of the districts for which appointed and shall receive the same salary and allowances and shall possess, exercise, and perform the same jurisdiction, powers, and duties as is now provided by law.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 2, line 4, after the semicolon, strike out the words: "For the eastern district of Virginia, one."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the first committee amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer my amendment, so that there will be no question about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Tennessee to offer his amendment. Does the gentleman from Minnesota withdraw his motion to rise?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. After the word "successor," line 23, page 2——

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment has not yet been submitted for consideration of the committee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I thought he was reading that.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment under consideration was the first amendment, on lines 4 and 5, page 2, to strike out the eastern district of Virginia.

Does the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] renew his motion to rise?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. STAFFORD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 9103, had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 2205. An act to add certain lands on the North Fork of the Shoshone National Forest;

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, December 10, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we are Thy children of need and necessity; we would therefore lift our hearts unto Thee, from whence cometh our help. We need Thee, for the load is often heavy and the way is often dark. Come with great wisdom to direct us and with sweet peace to cheer us. Redeem us from all worry and anxious care. Ennoble us with the spirit that stoops to serve and delights to sacrifice. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

AUGUSTUS S. PEABODY.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 3250 and concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas calls up the bill H. R. 3250 and moves to concur in the Senate amendments. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3250) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to convey to Augustus S. Peabody certain land in Galveston County, Tex.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD my remarks on the revenue bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. STAFFORD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having under consideration the bill (H. R. 9103) for the appointment of additional district judges for certain courts of the United States, to provide for annual conferences of certain judges of United States courts, to authorize the designation, assignment, and appointment of judges outside their districts, and for other purposes, finding itself without a quorum, he caused the roll to be called, whereupon 200 Members, a quorum of the committee, had answered to their names, and he handed in the names of the absentees for printing in the Journal and RECORD.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The committee will resume its session.

Accordingly the committee resumed its session, with Mr. STAFFORD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose last evening there was under consideration and pending the first committee amendment, which, without objection, the Clerk will again report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 2, line 4, strike out the words "for the eastern district of Virginia, one."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. There is another committee amendment to be acted upon.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Then I will reserve my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 19, after the word "law," insert:

"Provided, however, That after four years from the passage of this act the death, resignation, or removal of any district judge in any district for which additional appointments are herein authorized shall not create a vacancy to authorize the appointment of a successor, unless, within 60 days after such death, resignation, or removal, the Attorney General of the United States and the senior circuit judge of the judicial circuit embracing the court and district affected, shall certify in writing to the President that the condition and volume of business in the district courts within said judicial circuit are such that in their judgment the public interests requires the appointment of such successor."

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute for that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SUMNERS of Texas: Page 2, line 23, after the word "successor," strike out the remainder of the section and insert in lieu thereof "unless such death, resignation, or removal shall reduce the number of judges in such district below the number authorized by law prior to the passage of this act."

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to render these positions being created subject to the control of Congress—as far as Congress can retain control—until we shall have determined by actual experience whether these judgeships will be required as a permanent proposition. Gentlemen of the committee are familiar with the language which has usually been incorporated in the bills where judges have been assigned to districts where the presiding judge for any reason has become incapacitated and the Congress has not determined that an additional judge will be required permanently to discharge the judicial duties of the district. In such a circumstance as that it is provided that in the event of death, resignation, or removal of a judge in that district another judge shall not be appointed until congressional consent shall have been obtained. That is the purpose of this amendment.

As I stated yesterday, I believe no one can now say whether or not these judges, to the number now being provided for, will be required as a permanent proposition to take care of the business of the respective districts to which they may be assigned. In view of that situation, it seems to me well that in the event of the death or resignation of a judge in any one of these districts to which there will be assigned judges under this bill that the Congress shall again look the situation over and determine whether or not in its judgment the condition which then obtains in the district requires that another judge be appointed for that district. This is a precautionary measure, justified by the uncertainty which everyone must admit obtains, growing out of the present circumstances. Everyone recognizes that the volume of business in a number of these districts has been caused to a large degree by what is known as the slacker cases. Nobody seems to have a very clear idea as to how long the present volume of criminal prosecutions arising out of the prohibition legislation will continue. We are in a condition of uncertainty. Nobody will undertake, I dare say, to forecast what will be the condition of the dockets of the Federal courts within a few years. This amendment that I have offered will not apply within the next four years, but it is hoped that during the next four years we may be able to evolve a better method of taking care of a lot of the smaller criminal litigations which are now taking so much of the time of the Federal courts. For that reason, in view of the fact that Congress can act upon this matter at any future time, it seems to me that we ought to hold this matter clearly within congressional control.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for 10 minutes, to comment upon the discussion of a constituent of mine on the floor yesterday by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes out of order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, yesterday the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] discussed some remarks made by a constituent of mine, one of my predecessors in this House, a member of the Cabinet, the Hon. John W. Weeks.

Massachusetts is proud of her daughter State Kansas. She rejoices when Kansas sends here such virile and robust men as the gentleman who addressed you yesterday. [Laughter.] We are delighted to observe that Kansas takes pride in the title of the Sunflower State, and we are pleased when its Representative so accurately corresponds to the nature of its emblem. [Laughter.] The sunflower is an upstanding plant, glorious in its beauty and effulgent in its radiance; but I must not carry the parallel further, for we all recognize that at the end of the season it produces nothing of practical importance, its only fruit being a large circle of useless seeds. [Laughter.] Nor would I continue the parallel by recalling that when a Kansas zephyr blows the paint off the houses, the petals of that flower, waving in the air, seem to menace those within its view. [Laughter.] Rather would I, speaking more seriously, acknowledge the usefulness to this body and to this country of the services of the gentleman from Kansas, which increases all the more my sorrow that he should have seen fit to forget for a rare and exceptional moment the canons of good taste and good judgment in attacking on this floor a man who can not come here to reply.

The imputation that John W. Weeks, in his views on the attitude of Congress or its action, was moved one iota by its course in regard to appropriations for his own department should and will be resented, not alone by the citizens of Massachusetts but by all you who remember his services on this floor and in the Senate, who remember him as one of the ablest men we ever sent here—a man of calmness, a man of prudence, a man of wise judgment, who contributed greatly to the work of this Government during the years that he was here.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] yesterday expressed the desire that members of the Cabinet might learn by heart the message of the President delivered last Tuesday. Borrowing the suggestion, I have tried to commit to memory one sentence of the President, where he declared—

> There is vastly greater security, immensely more of the national viewpoint, much larger and prompter accomplishment where our divisions are along party lines, in the broader and loftier sense, than to divide geographically, or according to pursuits or personal following.

It was but two days after this that his Secretary of War saw fit to elaborate the same idea when addressing a gathering in New York. When the gentleman from Kansas intimates that therein there is some disloyalty to the Republican Party, he intimates there is disloyalty to a self-evident truth, acknowledged and recognized by all thinking citizens, irrespective of party. In the course of his remarks, to illustrate his view, my friend from Kansas saw fit to reprimand the Members from Massachusetts and the rest of New England for voting in favor of free hides, and he sent forth to the country a misstatement which I greatly regret should be spread upon the record, because he averred that in the matter in question New England Republicans, combining with the southern Democrats, overthrew the will of the Republican majority. What are the figures? The facts are that upon this question 29 Republicans from New England voted as he says, and 108 Republicans from outside New England. Among the strong speeches in favor of free hides, perhaps the strongest was by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY]. There might be placed next one from the lady from Oklahoma [Miss ROBERTSON], and, third, one from the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], who after serving in the House served also in the Senate. Were these three, and were their associates from beyond the Alleghenies, in the combination of which he speaks? There is no New England bloc, there is no eastern bloc, and I trust there never may be, because I trust we may follow the advice of our President in eschewing these combinations so dangerous to liberty.

We approach the next campaign under sorry circumstances. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We are to be held responsible for acts in large measure perpetrated by the gentlemen who just now started faint applause on the Democratic side—faint in guilty consciousness of their own share in the result; and yet it is impossible for us to make the people understand where the votes came from.

I have in my hand a page from the current number of the Outlook, a temperate journal which discusses public affairs chiefly from the Republican point of view, but always with caution and due wisdom. The editorial hereon says in the second paragraph:

> A chorus of disapproval of the special session's work has gone up all over the country.

That is absolutely true. The editorial then names 10 bills for which this special session was responsible. For five of them I believe it capable of demonstration that the responsibility really rests with the sectional and class combination that has saddled the Republican Party with this burden. We approach the election unable to explain that this thing was done against the remonstrance of many Republican leaders, unable to explain that again and again we have lacked the votes with which to overcome the attitude of this group of sectional Representatives.

It chances that in the same home paper in which I find a full report of the speech of the Secretary I find another address, by a Massachusetts man speaking to a manufacturers' association, in which he says of one of the enactments of this group of sectionalists:

> This law is one of the achievements of the so-called agricultural bloc, before which our whole Government machinery now prostrates itself. This effort to substitute sectional government for party government will overreach itself, as every previous effort has.

Mr. Chairman, when the President of the United States, speaking in behalf of the time-honored system of party government, begs us to remember how much vaster the security, how much larger and prompter the accomplishment, where we proceed along time-honored lines, and when those associated with him in administration see fit to spread his views, is it due and proper and meet for a member of his party to rise here and not only assail the arguments but also impugn the motives of the men whom we believe will nevertheless lead us safely through the storm? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MONDELL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Wyoming rise?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I came in when the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] was talking, and I am not informed whether he had the floor by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts secured unanimous consent to speak for 10 minutes out of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, that being the case, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to address the committee out of order for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to address the committee for 10 minutes, out of order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, there is a rule, a very wise rule, under which it is not proper to criticize in this body the acts of the other legislative body of the Congress. A like rule is quite generally observed in the House touching the acts of the Executive and the executive departments, and particularly upon the side of the party of the administration. That this is also a wise rule is illustrated by what has occurred here to-day and yesterday in the matter of the remarks yesterday by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER], and what has been said to-day by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE]. I do not know what the gentleman from Kansas said, I did not hear him, and I did not read his speech, but I understand his remarks referred to the fact that a member of the Cabinet of the President had seen fit in a public speech to rather severely criticize the Congress, and particularly, I might say wholly, this branch of it. I do not intend to reply to what the Secretary of War said, either now or at any other time. I shall merely express the hope that it may be remembered by the gentlemen who have administrative relations with the Congress that there is considerable question as to the propriety of their discussing in a critical way, a severely critical way, in a public address, the Congress or either branch of it.

Comparisons are always odious, and as far as possible we should avoid indulging in them. I have been here for nearly a quarter of a century. I have seen other managements and other organizations than that under which we are now attempting to carry out the will of the American people. I have never made a business of criticizing the organizations of the Congress at any time, but without a disposition to indulge in comparisons, I still insist that if the importance and volume of the work of the Congress and its notable accomplishments test its worth and the character of its organization, then this Congress up to this hour will bear with great credit comparison with any Congress that has sat here during the years of my service. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Perhaps I ought not be the one to say that, in view of the fact that I have had some considerable responsibility in connection with the organization, but I feel that under the circumstances it is rather essential that some one shall present the matter in just that way. And speaking of criticism, personally, as a Republican, I trust I shall never be tempted, in a public address, to criticize the Cabinet of the administration. What strikes me as being rather curious is that the Cabinet minister referred to confined his criticism to the House, whereas the fault, or the credit, as one may consider it, for the one thing which I think he really had most in mind to complain of, though he did not so state, that is the high surtax in that tax bill is chargeable or creditable, as the opinion may be, not to this but to another body. [Applause.] It seems strange to me that a member of the Cabinet, being disposed to criticize the Congress, and having in mind at the time, I think, one or two things recently transpired, saw fit to criticize not the body which took the initiative in the action he deplores but the body which, wisely or otherwise, merely followed the almost unanimous action of the other body. It seems to be popular to criticize Congress, but I have wondered why it was much more popular to criticize this branch of the Congress. Are some people a trifle shy of offending the gentlemen at the other end of the Capitol who have more jurisdiction than we have over some matters appertaining to and affecting the executive branch of the Government, and are we simply witnessing in these days further illustration of the time-honored pastime of whipping the willing horse to make the slacker go [applause], or of cracking the fellow whom one stands a little in awe or fear of over the back of some one else?

I can not agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts who has just taken his seat [Mr. LUCE] or with the gentleman from Massachusetts who holds the high office of Secretary of War, either as to the facts appertaining to or as to the character of certain legislation which they both disapproved.

The emergency tariff and its extension; the legislation effecting and strengthening the Federal land bank system; and the legislation extending the powers of the War Finance Corporation in the financing of farmers and stockmen were not the work or accomplishment of any agricultural or other bloc or combination, at least so far as this body is concerned, as there has been none such. It was legislation approved by the administration, of which the Secretary of War is a member, which received the support of Republicans in all parts of the country, including a considerable number from New England.

Contrary to the opinion of these gentlemen, this legislation was wise, sound, and has been very helpful. These acts will stand as among the conspicuously wise enactments of this Congress.

Now, I regret that this matter should have been discussed at all, either in New York or on the floor, though, knowing the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] fairly well, I am almost prepared to indorse, in advance of having read it, what he may have said. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, we expect criticism from the Democratic side. It is the business of the minority to spur us with criticism; it is their duty to do it. Times are trying. The tasks are not easy. The difficulties are many, and, do the best we may, we shall not make a perfect job of it, and we shall not for the time and as we work out our problems please everyone. Yet I repeat, if I may properly do that in view of my position of responsibility, that there has never been an organization in this House so responsive to the will of the majority as the present organization; there has never been a Congress in which this House better performed its duty to the American people or more nearly met their reasonable expectations. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] to the committee amendment, which, without objection, the Clerk will again report.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order, because it is in the third degree.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for half a minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for half a minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I rise simply, Mr. Chairman, to make the statement that we on this side feel that the matter so far has been very fully discussed, and we do not care to add anything at this time. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] to the committee amendment will be again reported. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

The amendment was again read, as follows:

Page 2, line 23, after the word "successor," strike out the remainder of the section and insert in lieu thereof "unless such death, resignation, or removal shall reduce the number of judges in such districts below the number authorized by law prior to the passage of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has been exhausted so far as opposition is concerned.

Mr. MANN. The Chair is mistaken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will stand corrected. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] stated that he desired recognition in opposition to the amendment, and then later asked unanimous consent to proceed out of order for 10 minutes. That negatived, of course, speaking in opposition to the amendment. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] is recognized in opposition.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the amendment as drawn will serve no useful purpose. The number should not be reduced below the number now authorized by law. That is not what we want. It is sought by the provision that is in the bill to give an opportunity to determine from time to time, as some of these judges die or retire in the districts where these additional judges are to be appointed, whether there is a necessity for another appointment. Now, we are trying to confer that upon the Attorney General and the senior circuit judge of the circuit where the district is located. If they shall certify to the fact that there is a necessity to fill such vacancy, an appointment would be made, but in the event that there is no such necessity the vacancy ought not to be filled. It seems to me that it is proper to leave with these two officers, who are closely in touch with the business in the district, the duty to certify to that fact. There is only one chance of a reduction in the number of judges, namely, in the event that business should fall off. It is hoped by some people that business may fall off, and if it does the Attorney General will know, and so will the senior circuit judge of the particular district affected.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The difference between the amendment offered by myself and the provision in the bill is that under the amendment offered by myself the Congress shall pass upon the question of need, and under the provisions of this bill it shall be passed upon by the Attorney General and the senior circuit judge. That is the difference, is it not?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That is the difference. You realize how difficult it is at times to secure the passage of a bill creating an additional judge. It will wipe out this aditional force that we deem now to be necessary, and until Congress could act again as to any particular district there would be no judge to take care of the business.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Does the gentleman think it would be wise legislation to provide in a general bill that the Attorney General and the senior judges of these various districts may provide whatever need there may be in those districts for judges from time to time?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I think those officers would have an opportunity to know, and as such could very properly make that certificate, upon which the vacancy would be filled.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Why not pass a general law letting the Attorney General and the senior judges in these different districts keep these various courts provided with judges throughout the United States?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I would not do that; Congress should provide a limit on the number. Those officers might provide a good many more than we might consider necessary.

Mr. MANN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. MANN. To address the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to address the committee for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that it makes any difference to me whether this amendment goes in or not. The committee amendment is an apology for the bill. Here is a bill that proposes to appoint 22 new judges, and I think perhaps the reasons given by the committee are sufficient for the appointment; but if so, it is ridiculous to say that perhaps they are not needed. No sane man expects that the business of the United States courts will decrease in the next four years. That is childish to say that a new judge is required, but perhaps he will not be at the end of four years. Why, the business of the country and of the courts is increasing and will not be lessened.

It seems to me doubtful—and that is what I rose to say—doubtful that the existence or appointment of a judge should depend upon a certificate in writing of some one that he is needed. I do not think that it is the province of the Attorney General of the United States to certify that there shall be a judge in this district or that there shall not be a judge in that district. [Applause.]

Congress provides for the existence of the judges. This provision says that at the end of 4 years—and there is no reason given for saying 4 years rather than 1 year or 10 years—if there is a vacancy, no judge shall be appointed unless the Attorney General shall say he is needed. Who is the Attorney General? Is he the legislative body? Is he the man to create judgeships? That is our duty, our responsibility.

I do not quite understand the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS], as I was unable to hear his explanation. I do not know whether that amendment ought to go in to change the committee amendment, but I think the whole committee amendment ought to be rejected. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas demands a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 26, noes 51.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, I sent up an amendment a while ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia has not been authorized yet to offer an amendment. The Chair was in error in not recognizing the gentleman before the second committee amendment was submitted. If the gentleman's amendment relates to the committee amendment now under consideration, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, I think it does not relate to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] is recognized to offer an amendment. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BANKHEAD to the committee amendment: On page 2, line 23, after the word "successor," strike out the remainder of the proviso.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I very thoroughly concur with the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. It seems to me that we are going very far, in dealing with so grave a matter as the Federal judiciary, to adopt the innovation of allowing the Attorney General, a mere temporary officer, acting in conjunction with the senior judge of the district, to have practically the plenary power, by their ipse dixit, to say whether or not a district judge, or in some instances possibly two district judges, may be reappointed for additional terms.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would be very glad to.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman understand that if his amendment were adopted and both the district judges, where one is now added, should die, there would be no district judge appointed in that district?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Upon what ground does the gentleman base that contention?

Mr. MANN. This provision is not one that relates to new judges merely; it relates to all of the judges of a district where one is added. Then the provision is that if a vacancy occurs in that district after four years the vacancy shall continue, shall not be filled, "unless"—and the gentleman strikes out the "unless," and that leaves it so that it shall not be filled.

Mr. BANKHEAD. After four years. It does not affect the situation until after the lapse of four years. It applies in the case of a vacancy existing four years after the passage of the bill.

Mr. MANN. That is true.

Mr. BANKHEAD. My contention is that in the event of death, resignation, or removal in one of these districts affected by this bill after four years, they must come back to Congress. It is practically the position assumed by the gentleman from Texas that if such a contingency arose after this matter had had the benefit of an experience of four years, probably it would be wiser for the Congress of the United States to determine whether or not there should be another appointment than to leave it to the Attorney General and the senior judge.

Mr. MANN. Of course, Congress could afterwards provide that there shall be one. It does not seem to me that should be in the law.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Technically that situation might arise where there is more than one judge in a particular district.

Mr. MANN. There will be where they add one by this bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will say to the gentleman that in offering this amendment I had not considered that possible contingency. It might occur, and yet I think it is a remote contingency that will not occur, that there would be more than one death in a particular district.

Mr. MANN. Oh, they will all die in time. When one dies the law provides that no one shall be added in any district covered by this bill. That would be 22 districts. There would be no one appointed after the judge who is there now should die. Of course, Congress could correct it in the future, but is it wise to put such a provision in the law as an expression of the will of Congress?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Illinois for calling my attention to that situation, and in view of my recognition of the validity of his objection I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment. I hope the gentleman will be moved to lead us in opposing the entire committee amendment.

Mr. MANN. Let us defeat the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. VOLSTEAD) there were—ayes 8, noes 36.

Accordingly the committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I rise to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HILL: Page 2, line 14, after the word "one" insert "for the district of Maryland, one."

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, on page 220 of the RECORD you will find a tabulation, which I offered yesterday in the discussion of my proposed amendment, showing the judicial business in the Maryland district and in the fourth judicial circuit, of which Maryland is a part.

In the fourth judicial circuit there were pending on June 30, 1921, 7,215 untried cases. The fourth judicial circuit gets no additional judge under the pending bill (H. R. 9103). On November 22 I introduced H. R. 9255, providing for an additional judge for that circuit, assigned to the district of Maryland. This proposed amendment covers that point.

It is to be noted that on the same page of the RECORD on which I discussed this amendment yesterday it is stated that there were pending in Maryland only seven prohibition criminal cases. The cases for which there is need of an additional judge in Maryland are not prohibition cases. Maryland is a law-abiding State. [Applause.] We have admiralty cases and civil cases which require an additional judge, and I rise to urge upon this Committee of the Whole the claims of the fourth judicial circuit, the circuit of Chief Justice Marshall and other great leaders of the bar and bench, which circuit is not represented in this bill. I urge that you pay as much attention to admiralty cases as you do to prohibition cases.

On page 2 of the report of the Judiciary Committee I find this statement concerning the pending bill:

Criminal business in United States district courts has increased over 800 per cent since 1912. A large proportion of the increase during the past two years in criminal business is due, in the judgment of officials of the Department of Justice, to the enforcement of the national prohibition act.

Of the total criminal business pending on July 1, 1921, 10,365 were for violations of the national prohibition act.

I point with pride to the fact that only seven of those pending prohibition cases were in the district of Maryland.

But I desire to call the attention of this House, following the remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS], to the fact that most of the increases—22 judges and $211,000 a year—called for in this bill are necessitated by the national prohibition act.

As long as that is the law it should be enforced; but I also call the attention of the House to the bill I introduced on Monday, H. R. 9286, the Federal local option bill, which will decrease such trials if passed.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Please excuse me. I have only five minutes. I ask the Clerk to read in my time two short editorials, one from the Baltimore Sun and the other from the New York World, on that bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it has any bearing on this bill to read editorials on prohibition.

Mr. DYER. They relate to the gentleman's speech.

Mr. WALSH. In that case I will not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to reading the editorials referred to?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

A DEMOCRATIC PROPOSITION.

[Baltimore Sun.]

Representative JOHN PHILIP HILL has put up to Congress a proposition on 100 per cent democracy and local self-government in his bill authorizing a vote by congressional districts on the legalizing of the manufacture and sale of light wines and beer. The Volsteaders will rage and the Anti-Saloon League scoff at the proposal, but inherently and logically it is an absolutely fair one. The Supreme Court has decided that Congress has a right to define what percentage of alcohol is intoxicating. The Volstead Act declared that more than one-half of 1 per cent is intoxicating, and though that was almost equivalent to saying that black is white, the Supreme Court upheld the power of Congress to ignore facts. Mr. HILL now proposes that Congress should raise the alcoholic limit to 4 per cent in the case of beer and 12 per cent in the case of wines, and to permit the voters of each congressional district to decide next fall for themselves in "local-option" fashion on the subject.

The prohibitionists are not likely to allow such a bill to go through, if they can prevent it. But, nevertheless, Mr. HILL raises an issue that will be reflected in the elections and which will put many Congressmen in an uncomfortable position. If they refuse to allow the people to vote on the question, it may be difficult for them to explain how they reconcile such an attitude with their professions of devotion to popular government. And if the prohibitionists are as sure of their hold on the country as they say they are, why should they be afraid to accept a challenge to a fight before the people?

A FAIR TEST.

[New York World.]

Representative HILL, Republican, of Maryland, has introduced a bill to liberalize the Volstead interpretation of the eighteenth amendment.

This bill would provide for local option by congressional districts on the subject of permitting the manufacture and sale of light wines and beer for consumption in homes, hotels, and clubs.

It would perhaps be overoptimistic to imagine that this bill will pass in the present session. The influence of the Anti-Saloon League is powerful in both House and Senate. And the A. S. L. will crack the whip.

If the bill can be brought to a vote, it will help. The roll call will identify the men opposed to such a law. In the next election the line can be drawn. Those who favor a reasonable and truthful interpretation of the eighteenth amendment could pick their candidates and fight the Anti-Saloon League with its own nonpartisan weapon.

A vote for the Hill bill would not be a vote for the saloon. It would be a vote against the bootlegger. This bill, or a similar measure, would form the basis for a fair test of public sentiment on the policy of prohibition as it exists to-day.

Mr. HILL. Maryland having only seven prohibition cases pending, and the fourth judicial circuit having 7,215 untried cases of various kinds, I ask for an additional judge for Maryland. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to make a speech on prohibition; but my friend, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL], makes use of every opportunity to make a speech on that subject, and I presume I ought to give it passing notice. I think prohibition is the settled national policy to-day. Everybody knows that the bill which the gentleman has introduced is in flagrant violation of the Constitution, and that a Member of Congress who has taken an oath to support the Constitution would have to disregard that oath to vote for the gentleman's bill. Everybody knows that 4 per cent beer and that 10 or 12 per cent wine are intoxicating. The idea of asking us to vote for a thing of that kind is ridiculous. The Supreme Court has never held that beer containing one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol is intoxicating, nor that Congress could say that a liquor that is intoxicating is not intoxicating, but the Supreme Court has held that if Congress deems it necessary for the purpose of enforcing prohibition to prohibit liquor that is not intoxicating, it may do so.

Now I will say just one word with reference to this request for a judge. Maryland has about the smallest number of cases on its calendar of any district in the country. It does not have business enough to occupy the time of the present judge. I presume this amendment was simply offered for the purpose of gaining an opportunity to make an antiprohibition speech.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to have something to say about the efficiency of this Maryland district. I am not surprised that there are only seven cases on the docket over there. Two or three years ago, when they were still selling "fire water" in Baltimore, three gentlemen from South Carolina—and they were gentlemen, too—went over there just before Christmas, and each one of them was taking a little home with him in his trunk. They were together. They went down and had some for themselves and their friends, but they had not enough to violate the 5-gallon law. They checked their trunks. They were forbidden then under the interstate commerce law to put liquor into interstate commerce. As soon as their trunks were checked the prohibition inspectors took charge of the trunks. They went and asked them if those were their trunks, and each one of them admitted it. Then they took these gentlemen up town. That was in the morning about 9 o'clock, and by 4 o'clock that afternoon I had an appeal from them to come over there, and I went over there. They had already tried them. They had had a grand jury pass upon the matter and find a true bill. They had tried and convicted them and sentenced them to four months in jail, and it was an awful looking jail, too. They had to serve the sentence. That is an example of the efficiency which people outside of Maryland used to meet over there, and I am not surprised, when you can railroad three gentlemen to jail in less than 10 hours by the methods that are pursued over there and make them serve the sentence simply because they are carrying a little Christmas liquor with them, that they have not any more cases on the docket than they have. [Laughter.] They do not need any more judges over there. That man can attend to all the business there is.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. UPSHAW. Remembering that one of the editorials which was read from the Clerk's desk at the request of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL] bore the caption that it was a Democratic proposition which had been proposed, I ask the gentleman from South Carolina how on earth a wet Republican can bring up a Democratic proposition before the American people?

Mr. STEVENSON. Oh, that is a contest between the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW] and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL], the celebrated rider of the white charger.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 4, after the semicolon, insert "for the southern district of West Virginia, one."

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, West Virginia has two Federal judicial districts and one judge for each. We formerly had in that State a Federal circuit judge, in the person of Judge Goff, but after that distinguished judge was elected to the Senate West Virginia was unsuccessful in securing the appointment of a judge or lawyer in that State as his successor. The result was that the judgeship went to Judge Woods, of South Carolina, notwithstanding the fact that folks back in West Virginia—during President Wilson's administration—made an effort to get Mr. John W. Davis put upon the bench. We, therefore, lost our circuit judge. After the recent death of Judge Pritchard, one of the judges of the circuit, whose residence was in North Carolina, we renewed our effort to get a circuit judge for West Virginia. We were again unsuccessful. The appointment went to Judge Waddell, of Richmond, in the eastern district of Virginia. It was conceded by all that the region constituting Virginia and West Virginia required the service of an additional judge, and for a good while, as I understood it, it was generally considered that this judgeship should go to West Virginia, but the Attorney General took the view that the Norfolk district seemed to be more congested, according to the number of cases on the calendar, and under his advice the allotment of the judge for this region was assigned under the bill as introduced in the House to the eastern district of Virginia. After that was done I brought to the attention of the committee—and I presume I am violating none of the proprieties in mentioning it—the fact that Judge Waddell, a circuit judge, resided in Richmond and that Virginia already had three judges, that the eastern district had two of them, and that consequently if an additional judge were assigned to Virginia that would give that State four judges, whereas my State would have only two. I have only the kindliest feeling for Virginia. It was not at my suggestion that the provision for an extra judge there was eliminated from the bill, but the plan was that the country should have 22 additional judges, and the report made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], of the standing committee, speaking of the proposition, says:

The first is the appointment of 22 additional district judges.

The bill carries provision for only 21 judges. The standing committee arrived at the decision to submit this question to the House, whether the additional judge should go to West Virginia or to Virginia. Yesterday the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] read before the committee a letter written by the judge of the eastern district of Virginia to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE], in which he said that he was able to cope with the situation down there and that no additional judge was required, so that as I understand the situation the Virginia delegation in Congress is not insisting upon having a provision in this measure for an additional judge in the eastern district.

In my State, as I had occasion to mention yesterday, there is a great and rapid development going on. Land titles are being litigated, coal lands are being put under development. New industries are coming in from all over the country in order to locate near the base of supply of coal and other fuel. High freight rates on coal is forcing manufacturers to establish their plants in close contiguity to an inexhaustible supply of fuel, good labor, healthful surroundings, raw material, and fine churches and schools. This rapid development has increased the business of the courts—civil as well as criminal business. The court calendars are crowded with cases. Our judges are unable to cope with the situation. We feel that we are entitled to this additional service at the hands of Congress. The administration of public justice requires it to be done. I therefore hope that you will find it consistent to vote for the amendment I have proposed.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I would be very glad to accommodate my friend, but I do not believe we would be justified in allowing an additional judge in West Virginia. There are two reasons to which I want to call attention. The number of cases on the docket is not very large, and it must be remembered that until within very recent times they were without any judge in West Virginia quite a long time. The former judge became disabled and finally died, and they were unable to secure the appointment or service of a judge for a good many months. That is the reason why there is anything like a congestion, and still there are a number of districts in which there are a larger number of cases pending, where we do not provide for a judge in this bill. The population is comparatively small, only a million and a half, and they already have two judges.

I wish to call attention to another thing. We purpose to offer as an amendment to this bill a provision, which has been approved by the Judiciary Committee, authorizing the judges of the Court of Customs Appeals to function in the district courts as judges of those courts. Those judges have had but very little to do for a number of years. There are five of them living here in this city drawing a salary, I believe, of $8,000 per year. They are capable men, just as capable as any of the ordinary district-court judges. The reputation they bear is very good. They can easily do work in West Virginia to help clean up the court dockets there and in some of the adjoining States.

It is our purpose to make those judges function the same as the other judges that we have on the pay roll. With those judges located here, there would be no difficulty whatever in supplying an additional judge, if necessary, down in West Virginia. It is true that as soon as the new tariff bill passes, for some months, perhaps for a year or two, they may have considerable work in the Court of Customs Appeals, but as soon as the construction of the new tariff law is fixed they will have considerable leisure. At least that has been our experience. During the last few years those judges have been without much of any work, and during the last Congress one of these came to me and asked me to introduce a bill to give them an opportunity to be assigned to district and circuit work. We passed that bill in the House, but for some reason or other it failed in the Senate.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. Does the gentleman feel sure that the judges who sit on the bench of customs appeal are as well qualified to act as the district judges?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. There is no question in my mind about that.

Mr. HUSTED. They handle but two classes of cases, reappraisement, and classification cases under the tariff law.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I know, but they are high-class lawyers; they were men who could have been put on the district bench or circuit bench when appointed.

Mr. HUSTED. But they have not been practicing for years. They have been serving on this customs court of appeals.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. What would these customs appeal judges know about land titles in West Virginia. Who would want to trust them to go out there and try an important case affecting property rights?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. They are as good lawyers as the average district judge trying such questions. There is no doubt of their qualification. The Chief Justice, and I do not think it is improper for me to say to you that he called my attention to the fact that these men were high-grade men and ought to be put to work, and that they were capable of serving in the district courts or in the supreme court or court of appeals in this district. And we hope this House will accept that amendment and allow those men to do this work, and if they are given the work there is absolutely no excuse, even with the congestion that exists to-day, for providing an additional judge for West Virginia.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOODYKOONTZ].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ROACH: Page 1, line 4, after the word "appoint," insert: "for a term of four years from the date of such appointment."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that.

Mr. ROACH. Will the gentleman reserve it?

Mr. WALSH. I will reserve it if the gentleman desires.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I offer this amendment because I did not have an opportunity to speak on the bill under general debate, and in order that I might express my views on life-tenure appointments. I am opposed to life tenure in any office, and believe that the people of this country are.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROACH. Yes.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. How does he think they can do it under the Constitution, that says they must be appointed for life. The Constitution says that all judges, both inferior and those of the Supreme Court, must be appointed for life.

Mr. ROACH. I take it that if there is an emergency existing, such as is claimed by the advocates of this bill, that temporary appointments could be made to take care of that emergency, and that at the conclusion of the emergency their terms should be made to expire. I assume that to be a fact, for the reason that in the report submitted by the committee of learned judges appointed under the direction of the Attorney General, they seem to have contemplated in their report that whatever action was taken by Congress with respect to creating the 18 judgeships which they recommended in their report, it would be only a temporary arrangement upon the part of Congress in order to meet the congested condition of the dockets of the courts of this country at this time. And if they were correct in their conclusions about it, then I do not see why such an amendment could not be made to the present bill and the other sections and provisions of the bill amended accordingly. That is as much as I care to say upon that particular phase of the amendment at this time.

I assume you have gathered from my remarks that I am not in favor of this bill. It may seem remarkable, coming from Missouri as I do, where there are to be two additional judges appointed, that I would not favor this bill. But I do not favor it because I do not believe that there is any insistent demand or necessity for it. If it could be shown to me, or I was convinced, that there was any State, or any particular district in any State, that really required an additional judge at this time, I would be among the first to vote for it, but to bring in a blanket bill, as has been brought in here, to create 22 additional judges and 22 additional other officers, and, perhaps, altogether 66 additional offices, at an annual expenditure of close to a quarter of a million of dollars at a time when the country needs to husband every one of its dollars, I am not in favor of that sort of a program. [Applause.]

Mr. DYER. The gentleman says he would be in favor of the legislation if he thought it was needed. I call his attention to the fact that in both districts the report of the Attorney General shows that there were 800 cases pending—in both the eastern and western districts.

Mr. ROACH. If the gentleman will take the time to examine those cases he will find that there are 792 of them that are bankrupt cases. And I will venture the assertion that out of 792 there is only one or two out of each 100 cases that could not be disposed of by a judge of ability in a few minutes, because all he would have to do would be to sign an order.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman has not read the hearings or the report of the Attorney General.

Mr. ROACH. Oh, yes; I have.

Mr. DYER. Then the gentleman makes a misstatement when he says that they are nearly all bankruptcy cases, because the reports show to the contrary.

Mr. ROACH. I did not make that statement. I said that there were 792 bankrupt cases, according to the committee who gave the table set forth in the report of the committee.

Mr. DYER. In both districts?

Mr. ROACH. In both districts. Not only that, but the committee further reports that the necessity for this legislation grows out of the fact that a number of cases have arisen on account of the fact of national prohibition. That does not appeal to me, for in the eastern district of Missouri, as shown by the table in the committee report, there are only 12 of such cases and in the western district 15, and Judge Slate, who sits at Jefferson City, could dispose of all those cases in an evening after supper, and you know it, and yet you want to bring in a bill that will cost the taxpayers of this country a quarter of a million dollars annually. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order. The gentleman from Missouri evidently has given but slight consideration to the provisions of the bill or the hearings which have been had upon it, or the report of the Attorney General. Because if he will refer to the report, he will see that there were 284 cases under the national prohibition law terminated during 1920 and 442 commenced, and that there are 487 cases pending, including 246 cases to which the United States Government is not a party. That is in the eastern district of Missouri. The committee held hearings upon individual bills covering both these districts, and the gentlemen representing the places where court is held in either of those districts, of course, are more familiar with the facts than I am, and can answer the contention of the gentleman that there is no need for any judicial assistance in the State of Missouri.

But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman offers an amendment which provides that these judges shall be appointed for four years. I make the point of order that in a bill providing for the appointment of United States district court judges it is not germane to appoint them for a specific period in the law.

The law requires, the Constitution requires, that the district court judges shall have a life tenure, and I submit that it is not germane, in the face of the constitutional requirement, for Congress to seek to restrict their term of office to any prescribed period; that it is, in other words, doing a vain thing. And while ordinarily the presiding officer in Committee of the Whole is not called upon to pass upon the effect of an amendment or to interpret its provisions, yet if this amendment were to be considered we would not be appointing additional district judges, because there can be no district judges except those who are appointed for life. If we were appointing, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROACH] sought to show, some sort of an inferior judge or to provide for some sort of an inferior court, to take care of some emergencies, that would present a different question.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. ROACH. How does the gentleman harmonize the statement just made with the provision which the committee itself has placed in the bill on page 2, the proviso: "Provided, That after four years from the passage of this act if there is a death, resignation, or removal, there can not be an appointment"? Is not that in effect a limitation?

Mr. WALSH. No; that is not a limitation. They are still appointed for life. That provision has been stricken out of the bill. But that only provided that if, after four years, a death occurred, such death or resignation or removal would not create a vacancy. But that provision has gone out of the bill. We are not seeking to establish any inferior courts or judges of inferior jurisdiction. I submit that the amendment is not germane.

Mr. BOND. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman wish to address himself to the point of order?

Mr. BOND. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROACH] offers an amendment limiting the term of the judges to be appointed by this act to four years. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] makes the point of order that it is not germane, and argues that because the Constitution provides in section 1 of Article III that judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, therefore this amendment is in violation of that constitutional mandate. All the precedents that the Chair is acquainted with are uniform to the effect that it is not for the presiding officer to pass upon the constitutionality of any proposed legislation.

The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole does not occupy the position of a judge of the Supreme Court to pass upon the constitutionality of a bill or of amendments that are offered to bills. Many times in the history of Congress bills are subject to objection on the ground that they are beyond the constitutional prerogative of Congress, and the individual Member may oppose them for that reason. Yet the Supreme Court, recognizing the fact that we have a Government of coordinate branches, does not even set aside a bill upon the ground that it is unconstitutional because they would have, as Members of the legislative body, considered it such, but they resolve the doubt as to constitutionality in favor of the Congress, and hold it unconstitutional only when they have no doubt that the Congress has exceeded its constitutional powers.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I have made no point of order that the amendment is not constitutional. I have made a point of order that it is not germane, because it is providing for a character of judge that is not provided for in the bill. The bill is providing for a United States district judge. This is providing for an entirely different class of judges, temporary judges. The bill provides for 22 additional judges, the district judges to be appointed for a certain period. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROACH] is seeking to transform the purpose of the bill to appointing another class of judges, namely, judges to be appointed for four years.

The CHAIRMAN. Leaving out of consideration, then, the question whether the Constitution has any effect on this question, the point of order now pressed by the gentleman from Massachusetts resolves itself for decision whether in a bill providing for the creation and appointment of judges for an unlimited term, as this bill proposes, an amendment restricting that term would not be in order as not being germane. The Chair, from that point of view, can not follow the reasoning of the gentleman from Massachusetts. Suppose this bill had by its phraseology provided that these district judges should be created for a term of life or for a specific term of years, it would be in order for the gentleman to offer an amendment limiting and restricting the term. Therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROACH].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment reported again?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks that the amendment be again reported. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROACH: Page 1, line 4, after the word "appoint," insert the words "for a term of four years from the date of such appointment."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, may I be recognized on the amendment in opposition?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized in opposition.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, we are now, of course, confronted by a proposition which involves a constitutional question. The bill provides for the creation of additional district judges. Under the Constitution the district judge serves during good behavior.

Personally I have always felt that if possible there ought to be a limitation on the terms of Federal judges; but I have never been able to find any way in which that could be done except by an amendment to the Constitution. So in my vote here upon this proposition, nothwithstanding the fact that I favor a limitation of the terms of Federal judges, I have gone back to the question of my oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and I know that under the Constitution as it now stands you can not create a district judge with a limitation for the time he shall serve.

Mr. ROACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. ROACH. Does the gentleman concede that if the title of these judges was changed a little bit from what it is in this bill, and they were designated as associate judges or commissioners, the provision would be constitutional?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am not prepared to say that. My recollection is that the language of the Constitution applies to the inferior courts.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I have it here. The language is—

The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Let me suggest to the gentleman that during the hearings, either before the House committee or the Senate committee, the present Chief Justice expressed the opinion that the gentleman from Tennessee is now expressing. As I understand, he went to the point of saying that any official upon whom Congress may confer judicial functions would come within the provision of the Constitution which has just been quoted.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It seems to me that is very clearly so.

Mr. EVANS. Is it the contention of the gentleman that if the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri were adopted and the bill enacted into law it would not be a district judge who would be appointed under its terms or is it the gentlemen's contention that the words of the amendment would be mere surplusage and not to be considered?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course, the gentleman is now leading into a wide field. I do not know how the Supreme Court would construe such an act. But this is not a question for me to determine on the basis of what I might think the Supreme Court of the United States would decide. I have to decide this for myself, and I do not see how, under the Constitution, I can vote to create a district judge with a limitation upon his term.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Did the gentleman hear me yesterday on the subject of commissioners of assize and nisi prius in England? They are not judges. They are not, therefore, appointed under the law of England, which says that judges shall hold during good behavior. They are simply appointed to aid the judge by holding trials. The judge signs the judgment, but the commissioners hear criminal trials and civil trials. In my opinion the Constitution of the United States, in speaking of judges, did not mean to include the aiding of a court if such an officer could be appointed to aid him. But that is not in this case and would not be germane to it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is where the commissioner is appointted by the court itself, is it not?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. No; the commissioner is appointed by the Crown and sent down as a commissioner of assize and nisi prius to aid the judge on the circuit in carrying on his business. We ought to have such officials in the United States.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. However that may be, that is the English system, where there is no written constitution. We are confronted here by a written Constitution.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. There is, however, an act of Parliament, which is equivalent to a constitution there, which says that all judges shall hold during good behavior, and these commissioners of assize and nisi prius are not reckoned as judges.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I suppose that statute could be changed any day by Parliament?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But we are confronted by a constitutional provision.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I think it is perfectly clear that one of two things would occur if this amendment were adopted and action attempted thereunder—either we would not create a judgeship, either we would not clothe an individual with judicial power, or, if we did, he would continue to exercise that power during good behavior. There is no question about that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman now speaks of the effect of what would finally be held by some tribunal that would decide the question.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Either we must do nothing or we would create a judge who would hold the position during good behavior.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think the gentleman is entirely correct about that. I have no doubt of it. But we are here now voting upon our own responsibility and under our oath to support the Constitution; and, notwithstanding I should like to see the terms of Federal judges limited, as a matter of principle, I do not see how I can vote for this.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The fact is that if we ever got this judge in he would hold during good behavior.

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will permit, I think that is entirely correct. The Constitution specifically names the Supreme Court and inferior courts, giving to Congress the power to increase the inferior courts as it sees fit, but specifically fixes the tenure either at life or good behavior, so that I do not think Congress has any power over the tenure.

Mr. BRENNAN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment aims to limit to a term of four years the tenure of the district judges to be appointed under the provisions of this bill. There seems to be no question but what the amendment is unconstitutional, for section 1 of Article III of the Federal Constitution provides:

> The judges, both of the superior and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, * * *.

Any attempt to limit to a fixed number of years the tenure of office of Federal judges would conflict with this provision.

But, aside from the constitutional question involved, there seem to be the best of reasons for defeating this amendment. Never in the history of jurisprudence has there been a judicial system so free from the slightest suspicion of corruption or bias as our Federal judiciary. Always our Federal judges have received their commissions from the President and their tenure has been for life. In our entire history only three members of the Federal bench have been impeached. We should hesitate long before attempting to change a system which has worked with such unparalleled success. It is said that State judges serve only for limited terms. But State judges, generally, are elected by popular vote and rightly find it essential to so administer their offices, if they seek reelection, as not to lose the confidence of the public. But if Federal judges were obliged to seek reappointment every four years, some might, consciously or unconsciously, have their decisions or conduct influenced by a desire to please the Executive from whom reappointment would come. Politics, which has always been forgotten the moment a Federal judge ascended the bench, could never be divorced entirely from the office. Under the system we have always known, the Federal judge has never found it necessary to curry favor from executive or legislative officers, and has had before him as his only guide his own conscience and the law of the land. It is a system which has made for independence and integrity, and it would be the height of folly to tamper with it.

There is another excellent reason why this amendment should not carry. It contemplates, as I understand it, the purpose of abolishing many of these judicial offices, which we are now creating, at the end of four years. If there is necessity for 21 additional judges in the country at this time, there will be greater need for that number four years from now as the population and normal business of the country increase. This bill, in the interest of economy, has limited the number of new judgeships to a minimum. I can not, of course, speak for the other 20 judicial districts affected, but I can say something regarding the eastern district of the State of Michigan. If we were to insist upon our real needs at this time, we would be asking Congress for two additional judges instead of merely one. At the present time there are 2,456,743 people in the eastern judicial district of Michigan, which includes the city of Detroit, the fourth city of the country. For years the bar and the public have viewed with amazement and admiration the untiring zeal of Judge Arthur J. Tuttle of this district in handling entirely without aid, except on rare occasions, the Federal judicial business of almost two and a half millions of people. There is no more industrious, capable, or faithful judge on the Federal bench. But even his unstinted energy has not enabled him to bring the docket to date.

There are particular reasons why the judicial business of this district has increased during late years. The city of Detroit in 10 years has increased from a population of 500,000 to 1,000,000. That increase was occasioned in great part by our industrial expansion, which in turn has created a large volume of civil litigation, which usually follows the establishment of new enterprises and increased relationships with the citizens of other States. We are one of the largest and most important ports on the Great Lakes. Consequently our Federal court has more than its share of admiralty litigation.

No city in proportion to its size has had a greater influx of foreign population. No city has assimilated and Americanized more successfully the alien which it has welcomed to its gates. As a consequence many days each year are used by the Federal court for the exclusive handling of naturalization cases. The creation of new Federal criminal offenses and the enlargement of the jurisdiction of the Federal courts have affected this district particularly. Being the center of the automobile industry, for a while Detroit was the especial prey of automobile thieves. The strict enforcement of the Dyer Act has abated this evil considerably, but in so doing has contributed to the congestion of our Federal court. Our proximity to Canada, portions of which have not adopted prohibition, has added to the number of our cases involving the illegal importation of liquor. Smuggling and immigration cases also combine to clog our criminal docket.

Hon. Alexis C. Angell, former Federal district judge in this district, is of the opinion that our problems can not be solved until we have been allotted two additional judges. But the public and the bar will welcome the relief offered by the one extra judge, and will be sincerely grateful to Congressman CODD, who introduced the original bill providing for this extra judgship, and to Congressman MICHENER, who, on the Judiciary Committee, was helpful in having Mr. CODD's bill incorporated in this general measure which aims to relieve 21 districts throughout the country. One of the valuable features of this bill is the provision which enables the assignment of an outside judge to service in a particularly crowded district. We of the eastern district of Michigan will depend upon the exercise of this authority for our relief until we have been allowed the two additional judges which we need. I sincerely hope that the amendment will be defeated and that the bill will pass. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The question was taken.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division. Perhaps a parliamentary inquiry might answer my demand, however. I want to know, if the motion prevails, whether it will preclude me from offering an amendment to this section?

The CHAIRMAN. It will not.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. And it will be debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. It will, if the gentleman is recognized for his amendment before the time for debate has expired. Does the gentleman withdraw his demand for a division?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Yes; I withdraw the demand for a division on that statement.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, is there not an amendment pending?

The CHAIRMAN. There is pending a pro forma amendment.

Mr. BOND. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. BOND. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BRENNAN] as to the unconstitutionality of the pending amendment intended to limit the appointment of these additional judges to a period of four years. I also agree with him that the provision of the Constitution which makes it obligatory that United States judges be appointed for life is a most wise and salutary one. Apparently this amendment is based on the theory that the present congested condition of the calendars of these courts is but temporary. I do not know much about the rest of the United States, but I do want to speak as to the eastern district of New York. The volume of business there has increased more than 60 per cent during the last year. In 1920, there were only 2,034 cases commenced, while in 1921 there were more than 3,200 cases. There have been filed as many as 20 admiralty cases and 10 or 15 bankruptcy cases in this district in one day. There are many so-called prohibition cases to be tried in this district, and this will be a permanent condition unless and until such time as the prohibition law is changed, as it should be, making a more reasonable definition of the term "intoxicating beverages." Unpopular laws are always subject to many violations and are difficult of enforcement. In the large cities, at least, the present prohibition law is unpopular. There can be no doubt that in the eastern district of New York, at least, there is most urgent necessity for this legislation.

Mr. Chairman, as I have already said, the increase of business in the eastern district of New York during the past year has been phenomenal. If the slacker cases are eliminated in the totals for the year 1920, as they should be, we find that 2,034 regular proceedings were commenced in this court for the fiscal year of 1920 and 3,271 in 1921. This is an increase of 60 per cent. The increase in some of the departments is even greater. The figures for the present fiscal year indicate that this increase will be maintained or, rather, augmented. There was an increase in bankruptcy in one period of over 300 per cent and in admiralty 400 per cent. There have been days when over 20 admiralty suits have been commenced and from 10 to 15 bankruptcy petitions filed.

The following statement of business in 1906 makes an interesting comparison:

Proceedings commenced.	Cases.
Admiralty	185
Law and equity	126
Bankruptcy	256
Criminal cases	74
Civil, United States	14
Total	655

In 1911 the total number of cases commenced was 1,009. It was deemed necessary at that time to have two judges, thus increasing the capacity of the court by 100 per cent. Furthermore, in 1906 the judge of this district devoted a great deal of his time to criminal trials in the southern district of New York. In 1920 the business had more than doubled the figures given in 1911, and in 1921 it had more than trebled 1911.

After Judge Veeder was appointed, the judges arranged schedules of assignments, so that one judge for a period of two months did the trial work, such as admiralty, law, equity, and criminal cases, while the other judge would take the motion calendars, occupying practically the whole of Wednesday and Friday afternoons of each week, and the naturalization calendar, which took up the whole of Thursday morning. In this way the judge would have Monday, Tuesday, and half of Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday to use for the purpose of attending to the ex parte business and for the purpose of going over testimony and considering cases tried before him and submitted to him for decision during the preceding two months. In very many cases judges had to read over 500 or 1,000 pages of testimony, voluminous briefs, and examine the law in opinions of courts. This practice prevailed until 1917, when the judge in charge of trials was compelled to assign the criminal work to the judge taking the ex parte and motion work. For some time this judge took, in addition to the motions and ex parte work, criminal trials on Mondays and Tuesdays. The pressure of business continued to increase, and for over a year now it has been the practice of one judge to try equity, common law, and admiralty cases, while the other judge did all of the ex parte work—that is, applications for orders, and so forth—general motion calendar on Wednesdays at 2 o'clock; naturalizations on Thursday morning, bankruptcy calendar on Fridays at 2 o'clock, and criminal trials at every other moment that it was possible for him to be on the bench. The result has been that instead of deciding cases tried before him during the preceding months, during office hours, it was necessary for him to come down to his chambers during the evenings and on Saturday afternoons and Sundays. It is no uncommon thing for the judges to spend from half past 8 in the morning until after 6 in their chambers, go to dinner and return, working until after 11 at night. If they did not do this, they generally took work home, which occupied them during the whole evening. It is difficult to think of judicial work in terms of mechanical labor when one considers the mental strain. It is not too much to say that the judges in the eastern district of New York often worked from 60 to 75 hours a week. The result of this terrific strain is seen in the breakdown of Judge Chatfield and his serious illness.

Going over the calendars in admiralty for many years, it is found that the new calendars made up in October every year usually average about 75 cases. The calendar this year for October 1 had about 300 cases on it, and many more have been added since that time. The law calendar has increased and so has the equity.

During the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921, 150 civil cases were tried in the court in addition to criminal trials. This does not convey strictly an idea of the amount of work done, for the reason that while two admiralty cases may be tried in one day, it is also possible to have one admiralty case take over two weeks to try. It is not so long ago that one criminal case took a period of nine months for the trial in this district. Conditions indicate that instead of there being a slackening up of business there will be a greater increase this year than in previous years. In addition to the regular proceeding referred to, there are many special matters, such as habeas corpus and many applications in special matters, not in regular cases.

The naturalization work is limited because of the fact that the judges can not devote more time for hearing naturalization proceedings. If more time, a half day each week, could be given to this part of the work, it would be possible to double the number of applications filed, thus relieving the situation. As it is, applications are of necessity refused to the great inconvenience of those desiring citizenship.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to print as a part thereof a report from the clerk of the court, giving in detailed statistics the situation in the eastern district of New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[1] At request of Attorney General, all cases in which no proceedings have been taken for a period of more than 5 years were dismissed.
[2] This includes 2,100 indictments in so-called "slacker cases."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the pro forma amendment to strike out the last word.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, there is another amendment to be offered, as I understand it?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Then I move that all debate upon the pending amendment do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri, which, without objection, will again be reported.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the Roach amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ROACH), there were—ayes 10, noes 53.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LARSEN of Georgia: Page 2, lines 8 and 9, after the word "one," in line 8, strike out the following: "For the northern district of Illinois, one."

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] gave notice yesterday that he would offer an amendment which would prohibit Federal judges from engaging in private enterprises. I understand that a point of order will be made to his amendment. I therefore feel justified in offering an amendment at this time. The amendment which I offer simply denies to the northern district of Illinois an additional judge at this time.

Members of the committee, I presume, know that the northern district of Illinois is the district in which Judge Landis presides. He is, however, not the only judge in that district. We find that in this district of Illinois for the last year there was a reasonable amount of work performed; at any rate, I am not going to criticize the work done. I do call attention to the fact that Judge Landis holds another very responsible position—supreme umpire of the baseball league—for which, I am informed, he receives a salary of $42,500 per year, in addition to his salary as a judge of the district court, making his entire compensation about $50,000 a year.

The press of the country indicates that he is giving a great deal of attention to the position which pays the most money, and in which he deals with Babe Ruth and other famous athletic characters. I think, therefore, that we ought at least to get enough information about this proposition to understand how much time Judge Landis is giving to the work in his district.

There is pending in the northern district of Illinois at this time, according to the report, 3,532 cases. There were disposed of last year in that district, according to the report of the United States Attorney General, 1,194 cases. For official comparison I call attention to conditions in Georgia. In the northern district of Georgia there were pending at the same time 3,845 cases, more than 300 cases in excess of the number pending in the northern district of Illinois. The northern district of Georgia has one judge, and that judge last year disposed of 1,773 cases, several hundred cases more than the two judges disposed of in the northern district of Illinois. So far as I have been able to ascertain from records available, during last year in the northern district of Georgia more cases were disposed of than in any other district in the United States which is served by only one judge. It occurs to me that the average maintained in the northern district of Illinois is not exceptionally high under any conditions. The work in that district is equaled if not exceeded by many districts in the United States where they have but one judge.

In the eastern district of New York last year two judges disposed of 2,922 cases, more than 1,400 cases each. In the southern district of New York four judges disposed of 5,147 cases, or more than 1,200 cases each. Certainly the character of litigation in these districts of New York compares favorably with that in the northern district of Illinois, yet two judges in the northern district of Illinois, as the records disclose, did less work than the average for either of the judges in the eastern or southern districts of New York. It may be possible that the duties of Judge Landis in administering the affairs of the baseball league consumed time which should be spent in the administration of justice in the district courts of Illinois. The committee is without information as to what the distinguished jurist is doing in the courts of Illinois. I therefore submit that an additional judge should not be granted at this time for that district until the Congress and the country know that his work as judge of the district courts is not being neglected.

Gentlemen, in my opinion it is most likely true that no additional judge is needed in that district. Press dispatches, I believe, reported that last week Judge Landis was in Buffalo, N. Y., giving his attention to matters concerning the baseball league. To-day we are asked to grant an additional judge to relieve congestion in his district. If we are going to relieve that district, why not do so by sending a competent man, which the district already has, back to his job and let him get to work on it? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment reported again?

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, for many years Chicago has needed and begged for an additional district judge. At one time provision was started here to give Chicago two additional judges. If any place in the United States needs additional judges, they are needed in that district, which transacts an immense business, not consisting in the main, as is the case in the district of my distinguished friend who just spoke, of things like liquor cases or bankruptcy cases.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield for a little information on that point? In the northern district of Illinois last year 160 cases were tried, and in the northern district of Georgia 256 cases were tried.

Mr. MANN. The business in Chicago is manyfold larger than the business in Georgia. That goes without saying.

I rise not to explain that, because everybody here knows it, even my beloved friend from Georgia. It has been popular to attack Judge Landis. He is one of the hardest-working judges in this country. I know of no other judge who does more business in his court than he does. He has been attacked because he became the head of organized baseball. There is perhaps proper criticism to be leveled at that. But what was the situation? Organized baseball represents the baseball interests of the United States. The baseball interests of the United States extend to every school and every street, every vacant lot in the United States. It is the great game of the American people. It is the outlet of their enthusiasm. There is no other thing in American life which answers the playing of baseball. I do not play it, but I am a baseball fan. I wish there were more. [Applause.] I go to a baseball game whenever there is a chance for me to do so. I love to see it played. I know it does me good, and I know it does the little fellow good from the time he is four years old up to the time he plays the game, and then in after years, to look at it. And some of the old fogies here ought to go to the game instead of putting in their time attacking Judge Landis. [Laughter.] What is the situation? Baseball in the United States was in a critical state. It had lost the confidence of the people largely as to its honesty. People believed that Judge Landis was above suspicion as to his honesty, and because he stood so high as an honest man the baseball magnates selected him to head them in order to restore the confidence of the American people in the game. It has had the proper effect. Jump onto him; he can not answer you. Roast him; he can not answer you. After all, he has done a great service to the country in that position. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to discuss the amendment. I am very sorry, indeed, that I have not been able to be present to take part in these discussions. I am very anxious, however, that this legislation should pass. I think that its passage will be not only a great advantage in the administration of justice in the United States, but that it is imperatively necessary. Gentlemen, I should have supported a bill that would have made an increase in the number of judges in the United States without assignments; I am very glad, indeed, to support this bill, increasing the number with assignments. I do not know as to the merits of these amendments. I presume it is not likely that many of us can really know their merits. I am willing to follow the judgment of the Committee on the Judiciary and the judgment of this Committee of the Whole as to the proper and rightful determination of them. But, gentlemen, if we do not realize that there is a crisis upon us, upon the Nation, upon the entire administration of justice in the United States, it seems to me that we are not alive to the conditions that confront us. We ought to realize, as I am sure we all do, that after all, if there is a failure in the administration of justice in the United States it is a menace to the very foundation of our Government. We can get along with an indifferent Executive; we can get along with an incompetent Congress even, but we can not get along with an administration of justice that does not commend itself to the good judgment and approval of the people of the United States. After all, it is necessary that we should maintain an administration of the law which shall hold the confidence and approval of the people of the United States or our system of Government fails. We can, if necessary, get along with bad officers; we can get along with bad laws, but we can not get along with insufficient or with halting or with an inadequate administration of justice in the United States. Let us not hesitate upon this great proposition. Let no mere incident, let no mere proposition here that you do not approve cause you to neglect the serious duty that we have before us. We know that our courts are so clogged now throughout the whole United States that proper administration of justice is denied to the people. We know that these conditions exist. We know they are caused largely because there is not a sufficient number of judges to administer the law. Then let us not hesitate, gentlemen, to do our duty in regard to this matter. To supply the people of the United States with an adequate administration of justice is something they have a right to demand at our hands. So I hope this committee will report promptly the bill that will at least, in a measure, remove these criticisms and conditions and real delinquencies that now exist in the administration of justice in the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending amendment be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN], which, without objection, the Clerk will again report.

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 19, noes 58.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FITZGERALD] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. How much time is there remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Six minutes.

The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FITZGERALD: Page 2, line 5, after the word "one" where it occurs the first time insert: "for the southern district of Ohio, one."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I confine my remarks on this bill and amendment to the able and persuasive argument prepared and submitted by the bar of my home city, Dayton. The southern district of Ohio is in the sixth United States judicial circuit, which is composed of the States of Michigan, Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee. This circuit has a population in excess of 14,000,000 people. Under the existing law there are 10 United States district judges within this circuit.

The sixth judicial circuit can be conservatively said to include a greater number of large cities and important industrial centers than any other of the nine judicial circuits within the United States. Among these cities are the following:

In Michigan: Detroit.
In Ohio: Cleveland, Cincinnati, Toledo, Columbus, Akron, Dayton, Youngstown, Springfield, Canton, Middletown, Sandusky, Steubenville, Lima, Hamilton, Portsmouth, Ironton, Zanesville, Chillicothe, Piqua, and many others.
In Kentucky: Louisville, Covington, Newport, Lexington, and others.
In Tennessee: Chattanooga, Nashville, Memphis, Knoxville.

The industrial activities and the diversity of manufacture within this circuit are second to none in the United States. By comparison with other circuits the following condition is revealed:

The sixth circuit, as heretofore stated, is served by 10 district judges. The fifth circuit, of approximately the same population, has 16 district judges. By House bill No. 9103 it is proposed to give the fifth circuit 2 additional district judges, making in all 18, and the sixth circuit, 3 additional judges, making a total of but 13.

The ninth circuit, with but half the population of the sixth circuit, and exclusive of admiralty and miscellaneous cases, about a like number of cases pending, has 20 district judges as against the sixth circuit with but 10, and under this bill as reported by the committee, the ninth circuit will have 24 district judges as against the sixth circuit but 13. To some extent this disparity may be explained by the larger territory embraced in the fifth and ninth circuits, but we submit that the preponderance of industrial activities in the sixth circuit to a large extent nullifies this argument.

This bill, as reported, provides an additional district judge for the northern district of Ohio. At present there are two district judges in the northern district and two in the southern district of Ohio. It is conceded that an additional district judge is needed for the northern district of Ohio. I submit that an additional district judge is likewise needed for the southern district of Ohio. Of the two judges now serving in the southern district of Ohio, services of the one are required continuously in Cincinnati, and at times the services of the other judge are also required there. The other judge in the southern district as at present constituted holds court in Columbus almost continuously, and from time to time in Dayton and Steubenville. A considerable portion of his time must, therefore, be occupied in travel between these three cities. By reason of his work being devoted exclusively to holding court in Cincinnati, it is possible for the judge there to hold three terms of court each year. Columbus, Dayton, and Steubenville, on the other hand, because one judge must serve them all, have but two terms a year. This latter condition obviously results in many instances in inability on the part of those charged with criminal offenses under the Federal law, as well as on the part of litigants in civil action, to have their cases heard and disposed of without undue delay. It is to furnish relief from this condition that has been the moving force in bringing about the proposal for additional district judges. It is apparent with semi-annual terms of court, in May and November, persons arrested for violation of the Federal law must lie in jail awaiting action by the Federal grand jury for an average of three months, and, of course, in many instances for almost the full period of six months. The same rule is, of course, applicable to civil actions.

In that part of the southern district of Ohio outside of Cincinnati and the immediate vicinity are embraced the following large and important communities: Columbus, Dayton, Springfield, Urbana, Sidney, Piqua, Troy, Greenville, Newark, Zanesville, Steubenville, Bellaire, Bridgeport, St. Clairsville, Lancaster, New Lexington, Marietta, Chillicothe, Wilmington, and many others. In this region are vast manufacturing activities embracing almost every kind of manufacture, from the taking of coal, iron, and other minerals from the ground to the production of finished articles of the most intricate mechanism. Most of the articles manufactured are of wide use in interstate commerce and many enjoy a world-wide market.

A manufacturing district of this type is naturally the home of many important patented articles; for the protection of the rights therein the Federal courts must needs be frequently applied to.

The city of Dayton, above referred to as within the southern district of Ohio, is known the world over for its manufacture of mechanical devices of highly intricate nature, requiring the greatest and most exact skill in the manufacture, the most of which enjoy patent protection at the hands of all nations. Important among the manufacturers of these devices are:

The National Cash Register Co.
The Davis Sewing Machine Co.
The General Motors Corporation.
The Dayton Engineering Laboratories Co.
The Domestic Engineering Co.
The Computing Scale Co.
The Dayton-Wright Airplane Co.
The Recording & Computing Machines Co.
The Dayton Manufacturing Co.
The Ohmer Fare Register Co.
The Egry Register Co.
The Dayton Rubber & Manufacturing Co.
The Ingle System Co.

Dayton has as well large Government activities, being the site of the Central Branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers and the two United States Army aviation fields—McCook Field and Wilbur Wright Field. Through the territory in and around Dayton run some of the largest railway transportation systems in the country, including the New York Central lines, Pennsylvania lines, Baltimore & Ohio, and Erie Railroads. In addition to this the Miami Valley is well known to be one of the richest agricultural producing communities to be found anywhere.

In conclusion we wish to say this, that too high a tribute can not be paid to Judge John E. Sater, the present district judge, who holds court at Columbus, Steubenville, and Dayton, or to Judge John W. Peck, who holds court at Cincinnati, and who are the present two district judges in the southern district of Ohio. Judge Sater gives willingly of his time and energy to the work thus placed upon him, which is accentuated by the fact that he is required to cover so much territory and has and merits the respect and gratitude of the bar and the public generally for his conscientious service. However, it is well known to everyone who has business with the courts that there are many times when matters of great urgency come up and in which speedy action is necessary in order that the rights of all parties may be fully preserved. In order that this may be accomplished it is apparent that there should be another judge in the southern district of Ohio, conveniently located to some of the large centers referred to outside of Columbus, so that he may be immediately available.

I call attention to the report accompanying House bill No. 9103, being Report No. 482, House of Representatives, Sixty-seventh Congress, first session, where, at page 5, it is authoritatively stated that no expense will be put upon the people by the creation of additional judgeships, because the average amount of fines, forfeitures, and penalties collected by each judge is greatly in excess of the salary list necessary for the maintenance of such judge and his court.

The creation of an additional judge in the southern district of Ohio is justified, therefore, as an economy measure. We would suggest, further, that the available statistics setting forth the number of cases is not in all instances a fair criterion of the need of additional judges. With more Federal courts available, the Federal jurisdiction will be more frequently invoked. The courts of the United States should be readily and speedily available to all citizens, and an additional district judge should be provided for that part of southern Ohio centering around Dayton.

Within the last few minutes I have received a telegram from the Hon. John E. Sater, of Columbus, who, with the Hon. John W. Peck, of Cincinnati, are the two United States district judges for the southern district of Ohio. Let me read this telegram:

COLUMBUS, OHIO, 9.36 a. m., December 10, 1921.

No additional judge needed in this district. Any representation to you that my work or work of district in arrears unwarranted.

J. E. SATER.

I wish to say that this telegram is absolutely true in saying that there is no congestion on the dockets of the courts in southern Ohio, but this is due to the marvelous energy of the two judges, who find all their joy in life in working more hours a day than any labor union would or ought to permit, and I venture this assertion, that if the other district judges in the United States were of the same forceful, energetic type no additional judges would be necessary, for there would be no congestion of the public business in the courts. Each one of these two judges accomplishes about what three others ordinarily would do, and I for one am opposed to overloading a willing horse.

Based upon standards of population and importance of litigated matters, an additional judge for the southern district of Ohio is needed far more than for some of the districts provided for in this bill, and I can not agree that congestion of the court business should be the criterion to determine the need for additional judges. Because the judge who sent the telegram which I have just read to the House is willing to go on performing the most extraordinary and exacting labor without complaint and even glory in the opportunity and constitute a living reproach to other judges in the land who with congested dockets find time for a generous amount of recreation and even to engage in very lucrative employment on the outside is, in my mind, no reason why an additional judge should not be provided for the southern district of Ohio. A candid examination of the tables submitted by the gentleman from Iowa, Judge BOIES, yesterday and printed on page No. 222 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will bear me out. On the question of economy, if this judgeship is not warranted, then there should be many conscientious votes recorded against this measure when it comes up for passage.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 19, after the word "law," insert "Provided, however, That after four years from the passage of this act the death, resignation, or removal of any district judge in any district for which additional appointments are herein authorized shall not create a vacancy until such time as the whole number of judges in such district shall be reduced to the number provided for by existing law."

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I think the observation of most people who have had much experience with courts is that litigation goes in waves, and I do not believe that the present condition of the courts and the congestion that exists there is a normal one.

This amendment would result in automatically reducing the judges in time to the number provided for by existing law, and would carry out the purposes, very largely, of the committee amendment which was rejected some time ago on the ground of the provision in the committee amendment authorizing the Attorney General and senior circuit judge of the district affected to pass upon the question of whether a vacancy should be declared.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 53, noes 53.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. WILLIAMSON and Mr. VOLSTEAD to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 51, noes 71.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PARKER of New Jersey: Page 2, line 4, after the word "one," insert "for the district of New Jersey, one."

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, how much time is left?

The CHAIRMAN. One minute.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I can say in one minute all I have to say. I spoke yesterday. New Jersey has more arrearage than any other State in the Union, including criminal cases, although their judges are working all the time. It is due to the fact that she has enough population for four judges, and she has likewise a tremendous amount of equity practice which is sent there by people who do business there, large corporations, and we can not get along without an additional judge.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Virginia rise?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I rise to offer an amendment which I sent to the Clerk's desk yesterday, which consists of an independent section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Is it an amendment to section 1?

The CHAIRMAN. It is an amendment as a new section.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It must be to section 1.

The CHAIRMAN. No; if it is an amendment to section 1 it can be offered. The gentleman offered an amendment, and the Chair directed the Clerk to report it. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Virginia: Amend section 1 by inserting a new section, to read as follows:

"SECTION 1a. That the last section 1 of the Judicial Code is amended as follows: 'Every district judge shall reside in the district or one of the districts for which he is appointed and shall devote his time to the duties of his office, and shall not engage in any other employment for which he receives compensation; and for offending against the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor.'"

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not in order and is not germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill. Does the gentleman from Virginia desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I understand that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has the floor.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the bill does not relate to any provision of this kind whatever. It is a specific bill in reference to the appointment of new judges, and the assignment of judges in different districts, and their allowance for expenses when away from home, and a provision in reference to a meeting of judges. There is no general provision in the bill to which this could be related, and the bill is not a revision of the judicial title. I would be glad to hear the gentleman from Virginia, who is very able and quite ingenious, explain how he thinks this amendment is germane to any provisions of this bill or to the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I realize that when it comes to the discussion of any parliamentary question, or, indeed, any other question, I am at a very great disadvantage where the view I entertain is opposed by the very distinguished gentleman from Illinois.

He objects that the amendment is not germane. Of course, that is altogether aside from the merits of the amendment. If the amendment can be brought to a vote, I entertain very little doubt that it will receive the approval of the committee.

Is the amendment germane? This bill deals with the judiciary. It deals with the district courts. It deals with the district judges. It deals in part with provisions of the Judicial Code. It proposes to amend at least sections 13 and 18 of the Judicial Code. The amendment I have proposed has reference to the district courts, to the district judges, and to the Judicial Code. The first section of the Judicial Code provides that judges of the district courts shall reside within their districts, and makes it a high misdemeanor for them to violate that provision. The design of my amendment is to go a step further and to make it a high misdemeanor not only to violate that provision but to violate the new provision incorporated in the amendment, to wit, the provision that forbids a district judge from engaging for compensation in other employment than his judicial work. That for one thing.

Then the bill is shot all through with the purpose to take care of and expedite the work that is carried on in the district courts, and except for that being the purpose the bill would not be here. Now, the amendment suggests one incident to the work being properly and efficiently conducted—of meeting the present congestion and preventing congestion occurring in the future. It would say to a judge, "You must attend to the business of your office and you ought not to be allowed any diversion toward other business, however profitable it may be, however much it may tend to enrich you." So I say, regarding the literal terms of the bill and then again regarding the general purpose of the bill, the amendment is germane.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. May I call the attention of the gentleman to the expression in line 18, on page 2? The concluding sentence of that section is—

Said judges shall be residents of the districts for which appointed and shall receive the same salary and allowances and shall possess, exercise, and perform the same jurisdiction, powers, and duties as is now provided by law.

It relates, among other things, to the duties of the judges. Now, the gentleman is undertaking in his amendment, as I understand it, to define the duties of the judges. Does it not relate directly to the word "duties" in that particular section?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Undoubtedly. It seems to me, apart from any precedent that may bear upon the question, it is sound common sense to allow this amendment to be passed upon by the House with a view of accomplishing a very desirable result.

When we talk of precedents, Mr. Chairman, we are obliged to recognize what lawyers commonly recognize when they talk about precedents in the courts, that you can find precedents both ways. I have no doubt that there are some precedents in favor of the point of order. There are unquestionably precedents opposed to the point of order, and one that is exactly pertinent, which dates back as far as 1902. It is cited in Hinds' Precedents, volume 5, section 5824. On June 7, 1902, a bill was under consideration here to amend the act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy.

Mr. De Armond, of Missouri, moved to amend that bill by striking out all of the enacting clause and providing for a repeal of the entire bankruptcy law. If that was permissible, a fortiori it was permissible to amend the bill by modifying any provision of the general bankruptcy law other than the particular provisions that were covered by the bill. The Speaker pro tempore, Mr. Dalzell, of Pennsylvania, overruled the point of order. He held that the proposition to amend the bill, which was restricted to specific features of the bankruptcy law by repealing the entire law, was not subject to a point of order, and then he went on to say this, which justifies the remark that I made a moment ago:

For example—

He said—

it would be in order to amend the bill by adding additional sections amendatory of sections of the bankruptcy law not referred to in the bill.

Now, if my suggestion is not well founded, namely, that this amendment is germane to the general great purpose of this measure, in that event I appeal to this precedent as supporting my view, which is to the effect that when there is a bill here amending certain provisions of the Judicial Code it is within the province of the committee to consider an amendment or amendments that have reference to other sections of the Judicial Code. I understand that principle was in substance ruled at least twice during the extra session, and I am not sure that my valued friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] was not in the chair on one occasion when it was so ruled.

If there should be any doubt about the question submitted for your decision, Mr. Chairman, is it not best that the doubt be resolved in favor of the validity of the amendment? Courts are constantly liberalizing their procedure in the interest of justice. They are steadily discarding what we call technicalities. Is it not desirable that we should follow a similar course and enable this House, which is so crowded with business—more congested than most of the courts are—to dispose of matters that are brought up here, which we all thoroughly understand, upon which we do not need to have any more light, with as little insistence upon the technicalities of parliamentary practice as possible? It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, with great deference to my distinguished friend from Illinois, that I have offered an amendment that is tenable, notwithstanding his point of order.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I understand the gentleman to maintain that an amendment proposing to amend any section of the Judicial Code would be in order on this bill. Does the gentleman think that any amendment changing the jurisdiction of United States courts as to the amount involved in controversies, or in reference to citizenship, would be in order on this bill?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. That is exactly what was held in the precedent that I have cited.

Mr. MANN. I do not think so, but I am asking what the gentleman contends.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I think, Mr. Chairman, it is hardly necessary to discuss the application of the precedent to the extent indicated by the inquiry of the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. As I understood the gentleman's argument, he contended it is in order to amend any section of the Judicial Code on this bill.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I certainly contend that where the same general subject matter is under consideration that an amendment of some other section of the Judicial Code not specified in the bill is permissible.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman's argument to be that because this bill amended one section or two sections or three sections of the Judicial Code, therefore, under the rulings, it is in order to amend any section of the Judicial Code. Is that the gentleman's position, may I ask, respectfully?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I do not rely upon that proposition. I rely mainly upon the proposition first stated, that the amendment is germane to the bill without reference to the precedent which I cited. As to the precedent, I can only say that the precedent would sustain the amendment even though the amendment related to something besides the district courts, the district judges, and the duties of the district judges. However, we can confine ourselves, for the purposes of this discussion, to the district courts, the district judges, and the duties of the district judges.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Virginia yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from Illinois if the amendment were to be limited to the 22 judges to be added under this bill, would it not then be relevant?

Mr. MANN. I am going to side-step that inquiry just as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] side-stepped my inquiry. That is not the pending amendment. The gentleman from Virginia abandons the argument which he made. His argument was that because of the provisions of this bill any section of the Judicial Code is subject to amendment on the bill. He practically abandons that argument, or that position, as I now understand him. That was the only argument I thought that he made in favor of the amendment. I do not see how it is possible, because the bill is brought in here on one subject for one purpose, to contend that therefore that opens up the whole law to amendment in any particular. I am familiar with the decision of Mr. Dalzell, referred to. It did not go to that extent at all.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the misapprehension under which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is laboring is apt to becloud the matter now before the Chair. This proposal is not, as I understand it, a general amendment of the Judicial Code. This amendment affects the conduct of judicial officers, and that surely is germane to a bill creating new judicial officers. I hardly think the gentleman would object upon the ground of its being not germane, even though he might think it superfluous, if the amendment provided that the judges should perform their duties, and that is all this amendment directs. This amendment merely declares what now is the law, but it is law which this House has not enforced. This amendment is simply a declaration on the part of the House that hereafter the law will be enforced.

It is a high misdemeanor that has been laid to the charge of the particular judicial officer whose conduct this amendment aims to make impossible hereafter. Declaring it a high misdemeanor now does not alter its character in the slightest degree. Everyone admits it is a gross judicial impropriety. Even the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] himself, standing here apologizing for Judge Landis, did not undertake to say that this conduct which the amendment denounces was consistent with judicial propriety, and conduct inconsistent with judicial propriety is of itself a high misdemeanor. This House should have impeached him. It ought to impeach him for it now, if it wished to perform its full duty as the grand inquest of this Nation. That, indeed, is among the most important functions of this House. It is first and above all the grand inquest of the Nation, and when it finds conduct by any public officer inconsistent with efficient, loyal discharge of the duties of his office, it has the right, and it is its duty, to impeach him for that.

If this conduct were a statutory offense there would be no occasion for impeachment; the judge could be indicted. This amendment is simply a declaration by this House of the law as it stands with respect to these judicial officers and their conduct—a declaration that they must perform their duties, and not go outside of them for the purpose of personal profit. If that amendment is not germane to a measure creating judicial officers then the significance of the word "germane" is beyond the range of my intellectuals.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, without expressing any opinion of the merits of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE], I think the Chair will find precedents to the effect that when amendments are offered which are offered upon the ground that they are germane to the bill, they must be germane at the particular place in the bill where they are offered. The gentleman from Virginia offers this amendment to follow section 1. Section 1 provides for 22 additional judges and prescribes that their duties shall be the same as those of the judges heretofore appointed under the provisions of the Judicial Code. The amendment which the gentleman offers following that section, which deals with the 22 additional judges, relates not only to those judges but to the judges who have been heretofore appointed. There is nothing in section 1, there is nothing at this particular place in the bill, which deals with that, whether there is later on or not.

The bankruptcy case which the gentleman cities, the present occupant of the Chair well knows, has not been followed with uniformity since the decision was made, nor has it been carried to the extent that the occupant of the Chair at that time applied it. It would seem to me that at this particular place in the bill the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, which applies to all judges and which amends section 1 of the Judicial Code, is not in order because it is not germane to anything in the bill at this particular place.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, the theory of germaneness in parliamentary practice can not be different from the rule of logic which prevails in other provinces of human thought. There can not be any doubt that the amendment is logically connected with the subject matter under discussion. What does this bill do? In order to meet an emergency which has arisen in the courts of justice, in order to meet a situation which has arisen because of the fact that the Federal courts have extended their sphere of action, that new Federal legislation has been enacted, that new crimes have been created, we are increasing the number of judges, but in addition to that we are imposing new duties upon the courts now existing and upon the judges thereof. This bill, for instance, imposes upon the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court the duty of convoking, from time to time, conferences. In other words, this bill is not limited to the appointment of additional judges, but in order to carry out the purposes of the bill it creates new judges and it confers new duties upon the now existing courts.

It can not, therefore, be argued that the sole purpose of the bill is to increase the number of judges.

One of the methods of meeting the emergency is to prevent judges of the Federal courts from engaging in other occupations, so that they may devote all their time and all their energies to the performance of judicial duties, to perform which they are appointed. That is the long and the short of it. The object of the bill is to prevent a practice which has become frequent and which is an undesirable practice. It is not only an immoral practice, but it is an uneconomical practice, inasmuch as it wastes the energy of the court. And from this standpoint I would say the amendment is strictly in order, strictly connected with the subject under discussion, is strictly correlated, and if it were a part of the bill proposed by the committee it would have been considered an essential part of the scheme, of the plan which induced the authors of the bill to submit it for the consideration of the House.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the ordinary rules which apply to human reasoning make this amendment relevant, germane, and inseparable from the proposition before the House.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, the question of germaneness unquestionably goes to the subject matter and not to any code or any section. It is certainly true that a provision in a bill which defines the conditions under which an officer may hold his office is germane to a provision for the appointment of that official. And that is all, really, that the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] does. The amendment says this, that "if you are appointed you must hold your office in a certain way, you must devote your time to it, and you must not accept compensation from private interests."

As to the point made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], that this is not the proper place where the amendment should be offered, I can not conceive that there could be a more proper place, for it is introduced as a separate section immediately after the section providing for the appointment itself. It is certainly logical, it is certainly consistent that an amendment should be held to be germane which merely defines the condition under which a judge shall hold his office. That is certainly germane to the provision for his appointment.

The argument of the gentleman from Illinois was, of course, correct, as it almost always is, but his argument was beside the question. He addressed his argument to the proposition that because it referred to some other section of the Judicial Code which was mentioned in this act that the amendment was necessarily in order. Of course, that does not necessarily follow, and would not follow if the provision was not itself germane. But this provision is germane, and for that reason the fact that it refers to another section of the Judicial Code should not operate against it.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HUSTED. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Suppose this were a bill, and there have been many bills of that character, creating an additional judge in one of these districts—we have passed many bills of that kind—would it then be in order on such a bill to offer an amendment defining the duties of the judge already on the bench?

Mr. HUSTED. That, I think, is not a parallel question; and if the question was resolved favorably to the gentleman's evident contention, it would not make any point as against the question now before the House. This is a general bill before the House, and these provisions would operate equally as against all judges now in office or hereafter in office.

The gentleman is suggesting that a general amendment might not be germane to a particular appointment. Well, that is undoubtedly true, but this is a general provision applying in a general bill, applying to all judges, either created by this bill or who are now in office.

Mr. MANN. I do not quite understand the distinction the gentleman makes as to what he calls a "general bill." A bill creating a new judge is a public bill. This creates more than one judge, but a limited number.

Mr. CLOUSE. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. CLOUSE. I just wanted to ask the gentleman this question: If the bill now under consideration is not general in its character?

Mr. MANN. I think it is.

Mr. CLOUSE. Since it provides for a conference of all judges now existing and those to be appointed.

Mr. MANN. I think all the bills are public bills, but they are not what you call general bills. I do not know just what the definition of a general bill is. Generally the definition is wrong wherever it applies.

Mr. CLOUSE. Does it not affect all judges, those that are now holding and have heretofore been appointed, as well as those to be appointed under the bill?

Mr. MANN. It does in some respects.

Mr. CLOUSE. Then would it not be germane if it affects the judiciary under the present system and those judges are embraced in the provisions of this bill?

Mr. MANN. I certainly think not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] offers an amendment as an independent section which amends the last sentence of section 1 of the Judicial Code by inserting after the word "appointed" the following language:

And shall devote his time to the duties of his office, and shall not engage in any other employment for which he receives compensation.

So that the sentence as amended will read:

Every district judge shall reside in the district or one of the districts for which he is appointed, and shall devote his time to the duties of his office, and shall not engage in any other employment for which he receives compensation, and if offending the provisions of this section he shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor.

To that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes the point that it is not germane. The bill under consideration provides for the appointment of additional district judges of the United States, provides for annual conferences of certain judges to consider matters pertaining to said courts, also makes provision for the designation of certain judges to other districts, and further changes the existing rates of allowances which judges may receive when absent from their official domicile on official business.

The Chair has had the advantage of the language of the proposed amendment since it was first suggested on yesterday, and has given careful consideration to the precedents, because the Chair realizes that the question is not entirely free from difficulty, and very few questions relating to germaneness are free from difficulty. The Chair has listened attentively to the arguments made by all who have addressed the Chair, particularly the argument made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE], the proponent of the amendment.

The gentleman invokes the rule that because the bill under consideration amends two or three provisions of the Judicial Code, therefore it is in order to amend all or any section of the entire Judicial Code. The Chair can not subscribe to that doctrine, since it would violate the fundamental principles that guide the procedure of the House in the consideration of questions that come up from time to time. The very purpose of the rule of germaneness is to center the attention of the House on the consideration of the matter before it, not to liberalize it to the extent suggested by the gentleman from Virginia, that any amendment relevant to the subject matter could be considered.

If the Chair should hold, as the gentleman from Virginia contends, that every bill amending more than one section of a code or of a statute would make amendments to every other section in order, it goes without saying that there would be no end to the discussion before this body.

The gentleman cited a decision made some years ago as found in Fifth Hinds, section 5824, relating to the bankruptcy law, and called the attention of the Chair to the ruling of Congressman Dalzell, an eminent parliamentarian, who held that in the case of a bill modifying many sections of the bankruptcy law, vitally affecting all of the sections of the bankruptcy law, it would be in order to offer an amendment to repeal that law. Only in the last Congress, when that same citation was called to the attention of the present Speaker on a Senate amendment to an appropriation bill, the Speaker then pointed out—and the decision may be found in toto in section 954 of the Manual—that for that rule to have application the bill or provision under consideration must affect vitally all of the sections of the law to open an amendment for its repeal or its general modification. No one contends that the pending bill affects, or vitally affects, the 300 sections of the Judicial Code.

The clause as to germaneness that applies to this question is found in paragraph 7 of Rule XVI, which is as follows:

And no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

In all these questions of germaneness the Chair is compelled to analyze the various sections of the bill under consideration to determine what is the subject matter. This bill, as the Chair reads it, has for its subject in the main the increase of the number of district judges and by certain machinery to assign district and circuit judges to various districts. That is the subject matter. The Chair has not been able to find in his examination of the Judicial Code any provision whatsoever, and the Chair's attention has not been called to any law relating to the qualifications of judges of a district court or of any of the courts of the United States, nor has any reference been made, nor has the Chair been able to find any reference, prescribing the hours of employment of a judge, or the duties that devolve upon a judge.

The Chair follows the logic of the argument submitted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that if there was a bill under consideration providing, say, for the creation of an additional clerk and an additional chief of bureau, without any reference to the hours of employment, that it would not be in order to limit the hours of employment of all clerks and all bureau chiefs, or all other officials and employees of the Government.

The Chair has not the right in the determination of the question of germaneness to determine what the purposes of the bill are. He should consider the subject of the bill, as, for instance, in a bill providing for the establishment of an Isthmian Canal it would not be in order to consider an amendment providing for airplane transportation or other means between the coasts simply because the purpose of the canal was to expedite traffic between continental cities. The purpose of such an act might be to expedite traffic, but the subject is the building of a canal.

The Chair has gone far enough in his argument to show that in the opinion of the Chair the amendment is not germane, and therefore sustains the point of order.

The Clerk will read.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the Chair stated at the outset that the question is not free from doubt, I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is whether the decision of the Chair shall be sustained.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas assumed the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is called for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 59, noes 51.

Accordingly the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Chief Justice of the United States, as soon as may be after the passage of this act, may summon the senior circuit judge of each judicial circuit of the United States, and such district judges as he may deem proper, to a conference to be held at Washington, in the District of Columbia, or at such other place as he may designate. And it shall be the duty of the said Chief Justice to annually call such a conference and summon said judges thereto, to be held as aforesaid during the last week in September in each year hereafter. In case of the disability of the Chief Justice, the senior Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States shall perform the duties herein imposed, and in case any judge summoned to a conference is unable to attend, the Chief Justice or the senior Justice of the Supreme Court, as the case may be, may designate and summon any other judge of the circuit or district to attend said conference and participate in same. It shall be the duty of every judge, when summoned as aforesaid, to attend such conference, and to remain throughout its proceedings unless excused.

The said judges shall report as to the condition of the dockets in their circuits or districts and submit recommendations as to the needs thereof and advise as to the improvement or expedition of the administration of justice in the courts of the United States.

The district judge of each United States district court, on or before the 1st day of August in each year, shall prepare and submit to the senior circuit judge in which said district is located, a report setting forth the state of business in said district court, including the number and character of cases on the docket, the business in arrears, and such other facts pertinent to the business disposed of and pending as said district judge may deem proper, together with recommendations as to the need of additional judicial assistance for the disposal of business for the year next ensuing.

These reports shall be laid before the conference hereinbefore provided, by said senior circuit judge, together with such recommendations as he deems proper. In districts having more than one district judge the report herein required shall be prepared and submitted by the district judge who is senior in length of service. The Chief Justice shall be the presiding officer at the conference called hereunder.

Said conference shall make a comprehensive survey of the conditions of business in the courts of the United States and prepare plans and schedules for the assignment and transfer of judges to or from circuits or districts where the state of the docket or the condition of business indicates the need therefor, and shall submit such suggestions to the various courts as may seem in the interest of uniformity and expedition of business.

The Attorney General shall, upon request of the Chief Justice, report to said conference on matters relating to the business of the several courts of the United States, with particular reference to causes or proceedings to which the United States may be a party, together with such recommendations or requests as may be deemed proper. The Attorney General shall not be a member of said conference.

The Chief Justice and each justice or judge summoned to and attending said conference shall be allowed his actual expenses of travel and his necessary expenses for subsistence, not to exceed $15 per day, to be paid as provided in section 8 hereof.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SNELL. I intend at the proper time to offer an amendment to cut down the travel pay and expense allowance of these judges from $15 a day to $10 a day as applied to the general proposition of district judges throughout the United States. Whether it be proper to offer that amendment at this time or to wait until we have section 8 read, I should like to get the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. WALSH. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to state to the gentleman from New York that that is not a parliamentary inquiry. It is a question of the construction of the bill.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SNELL: On page 5, line 18, strike out the figures "15" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "10."

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I am in accord with the general provisions of this bill, but I do not believe that at this time we should add one dollar of extra expense that is not absolutely necessary. I would not object to the $15 a day allowance for the time that the judges spend in Washington, if that is the place where the conference is held, but I do not believe it is at all necessary to pay any of these judges $15 a day when he is traveling about the average country district attending to his official duties. Every man on the floor of the House knows that the great number of these judges when they are away from home do not spend to exceed $10 per day. We are legislating here not for the extreme cases, where one man is called to New York or some big city occasionally, but for the average case in the average district in the United States, and I do not believe it is at all in the interest of economy or efficiency at this time to increase that allowance to more than $10 a day.

Mr. LANHAM. Can we not obviate an even greater expense by striking out this section entirely? What is the necessity for an annual junket here to Washington the last week in September in each year merely to bring the record of the condition of the dockets in the various districts?

Mr. SNELL. I am not familiar enough with the work of the courts to know about that. The other proposition I think I do know about.

Mr. LANHAM. The provision seems to be simply that it shall be the duty of these judges sent to Washington simply to assemble data from the various circuits as to the condition of the dockets, and then to act as messengers to bring the data here.

Mr. SNELL. I will ask some members of the committee to answer that question.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Does not this provision simply provide for the expense allowance of the judges on their trip to Washington?

Mr. SNELL. That is all that is provided in this section, but it is all coupled up together, this and the allowance made in section 8 of the bill providing for regular allowances during the year, and I think both should be stricken out and $10 a day substituted in place of $15 a day.

Mr. DEMPSEY. But this amendment applies only to the trip to Washington.

Mr. SNELL. I expect to offer another amendment when we reach section 8, on page 10, and I think they should both be the same.

Mr. DEMPSEY. My understanding of the gentleman's statement is that he is not opposed to an allowance of $15 a day for the attendance of the judges in Washington.

Mr. SNELL. I do not care so much about that, if that was all, as they could spend that much in Washington, all right, but I am considering them both together.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I am afraid the judges when they come here will find that they will expend the whole $15 a day.

Mr. SNELL. That will not be very serious once a year. We increased their pay about $1,000 a year a short time ago to make up for their increased living expenses. I do not know of anybody else who has got increased pay—certainly not Members of Congress. And, furthermore, considering that they have a life job, I think they are being treated pretty well, and there is absolutely no excuse at this time, with a downward tendency in living expenses, to increase this allowance, and I trust, in the interest of economy, it will not be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Page 5, line 18, after the word "exceed," strike out the figures "$15" and insert the figures "$10"; and then, after the word "day," in the same line, strike out the balance of the line and all of line 19 and insert in lieu of the language stricken out the following language: "Which payment shall be made by the marshal of the district in which said conference is held, upon the written certificate of the judge incurring such expenses."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment so that it will begin by striking out, after the word "day" in line 18, the language "to be paid as provided in section 8 hereof" and to insert the language which the Clerk read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment as indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman is simply transferring the language of section 8 to this section. Is not that the purpose?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; and I will explain the reason. It is my understanding that when we get to section 8 the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] intends to offer an amendment to strike out that section, because we already have section 259 of the Judicial Code, which provides that these judges shall be paid $10 per day, and if that be the sentiment of the House—and I think it will be—then unless the gentleman from Massachusetts has some special reason, I see no reason why the whole section should not go out. But if it does go out, then we need the language that I offer, and for that reason I offer it here.

Mr. WALSH. I have no objection to the modification.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Page 5, line 18, after the word "day," strike out the remainder of line 18 and all of line 19 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Which payment shall be made by the marshal of the district in which said conference is held, upon the written certificate of the judge incurring such expenses."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, section 8 of the bill is the one which provides that the subsistence pay of the judges shall be $15 a day instead of $10 a day, and provides this method of payment. I understand that when we reach that section my colleague from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] intends to move to strike it out, leaving us with section 259 of the Judicial Code, which provides for $10 subsistence pay. Therefore, if that section is stricken out, there would be no section 8 in the bill, and it would be necessary to have the language that I have offered in order to provide the method of payment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee: Page 4, line 11, after the word "arrears," insert: "the number of days and the average number of hours per day said district judge has held court during the preceding year."

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, my reason for offering this amendment is that I think it would be a very important feature of this report required to be made by every district judge on the 1st of August to the presiding circuit judge, in connection with the other matters mentioned in the section in question. That paragraph provides that the district judge shall submit to the senior circuit judge—a report setting forth the state of business in said district court, including the number and character of cases on the docket, the business in arrears, and such other facts pertinent to the business disposed of and pending as said district judge may deem proper, together with recommendations as to the need of additional judicial assistance for the disposal of business for the year next ensuing.

It is a very important matter to determine whether or not that district judge has been conscientiously, faithfully, and diligently performing his duties in determining whether the circuit judge should assign one of these other judges to assist him. The purpose of this report is that the presiding circuit judge may determine whether the conditions in a particular district are such as to warrant the assigning of another judge to grant relief. I respectfully submit that while many of our Federal judges render faithful, conscientious service and work a sufficient period of time, yet many of them do not, which is a matter of common knowledge, and those who are not rendering faithful service ought not to be given an assistant in order that they may loaf still further on the job.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I see no necessity for the provision which is included in the gentleman's amendment. I do not think it is intended that Congress should provide that a judge shall work by a stop watch. We have eliminated that from our arsenals and munition works, and to say that a judge sitting upon the bench disposing of cases should have his eye on the clock each day and deduct the time taken out for recess and lunch, and also that he should keep track of the number of hours spent in chambers preparing opinions or giving consideration to cases, is drawing a line rather fine. If this conference is authorized, I think you will find that there will be more uniformity throughout the country in the Federal district courts in respect to the manner of holding court, that there will be an hour in the morning when these courts will pretty generally assemble, but I do not believe it is necessary that it should be written into the law as one of the requirements. It is not going to be for the purpose simply of finding out how many cases were pending and how many were disposed of, or how many were begun, that this conference is to be held. It is to find out the condition of the various districts and, as far as possible, make provision in advance for the transfer and designation of judges from one district to the other, to take care of business for the year ensuing, and also to arrange, if possible, for uniformity of procedure, and to get the benefit of the knowledge and experience of the various judges as to how cases in particular districts are disposed of relating to particular classes and perhaps to have some uniformity in the matter of sentences. It is hardly necessary to write all those things in the law. This proposal was made by the Chief Justice of the United States and was submitted by him to the Senate Judiciary Committee and also to the House Judiciary Committee, and necessarily it was felt that the proposition should be couched in rather general terms, because it would hardly seem necessary for the Congress to lay down any narrow, restricted limits within which this conference should operate.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. LANHAM. Could not that information be had and that relief secured without entailing the permanent annual expense of a conference here in the city of Washington? Could not that information be sent here and could not the Chief Justice and those who advise with him here pass on that and if necessary add to the report by such correspondence as might be necessary?

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman, of course, appreciates that in a matter dealing with the procedure of the courts a conference of a week would accomplish a great deal more than letters written from all over the country at various times and then an attempt made to collate the information. If the judges are here together, with such district judges as might be deemed necessary to be had, they can confer and compare notes and as a result submit recommendations which it is felt will be of great assistance to the courts in carrying on that work.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If the gentleman thinks that the assembling of this conference is so desirable, why was it not carried into practical effect by asking the judges before the committee to find out whether or not they think a conference of this kind is necessary?

Mr. WALSH. Some judges were here.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How many appeared?

Mr. WALSH. Two.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Out of 105.

Mr. WALSH. There are only nine circuits, and this involves only the circuit judges coming here, with possibly here and there a district judge whom the Chief Justice may designate to attend the conference.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The gentleman stated that this bill had the indorsement of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court.

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. How many judges did the Chief Justice recommend?

Mr. WALSH. He recommended 18 additional judges.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Then why has it been increased to 22?

Mr. WALSH. I stated yesterday that we have added to the number 18 the number of judges for which individual bills have ever been reported, some of which have passed the Senate.

Mr. HUDSPETH. One has been reported from Texas, and you give Texas one additional judge.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LEA of California: Strike out section 2.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate be closed in five minutes on this section and all amendments thereto.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, I will not yield for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, I believe there is a real need for increasing the number of judges in this country. But in my judgment it would be a mistake to make section 2 a part of the law of the land. Section 2, in effect, provides for an annual conference of Federal judges, to be called annually by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, the expense to come out of the Treasury. The judges summoned are compelled to attend whether they desire to do so or not and are compelled to "remain throughout its proceedings." Each district judge in the country is compelled to submit annually to the conference his recommendations as to the "needs of additional judicial assistance" for the next year. Every judge, whether he wants any assistance or not, must annually express his opinion upon that matter. Though they need no assistance, many will be required to travel annually to a common meeting place, at public expense, to so report.

The conference itself must, among other things, make "a comprehensive survey" of the court business of the country, and, further, judges shall "advise as to the improvement of the administration of justice." In other words, the Federal judges, in conference assembled, are to be a legally constituted and publicly financed propaganda organization in behalf of the Federal judiciary of the country.

I am opposed to this section for four reasons. In the first place, it places the judiciary of the country in a self-seeking position. In the second place, it assigns to the judges legislative and political functions, and throws the judiciary of the country into the fields of destroying controversies. In the third place, the conference proposed would easily deteriorate into a publicity-seeking propaganda effort. And, in the fourth place, it is cheapening to the judiciary for its judges to desert court work, to assemble annually at public expense in what would be regarded by the public as more or less a junket or annual vacation.

If the Federal judges of the United States were members of a legislative body, if they were a boosters' organization, or if they were a fraternal order, such an arrangement as provided for in section 2 might be appropriate, but I believe this scheme is wholly inappropriate for the Federal judges of the United States.

The scheme partakes of the nature of a junket for Federal judges or an annual outing at the expense of the Public Treasury. The conference is to be held in Washington or "other place," as it may be called. It can easily deteriorate into a publicity seeking propaganda effort.

I regard our courts, and particularly our Federal courts, as the first and last bulwark of our Government. It is of primary importance in the administration of our Government to keep the Federal judiciary so far as possible above legitimate criticism. We should not endanger the prestige of our judges or invite them into fields of destroying controversies by compelling them to perform functions primarily legislative or political. We should not encourage—or we should not require, as this bill does—our Federal judges to participate in practices that will inevitably subject them to charges of junketing and self-seeking at public expense.

This conference scheme will tend to organize our Federal judges into a judicial machine. It will furnish new grounds of attack by those who would weaken and destroy the functions of our Federal courts.

Historians, scholars, and statesmen have assumed that our written Constitution was a perpetual guaranty of our form of government that would preserve its framework even against the attacks of legislatures or courts. That assumption has not been entirely justified. What becomes of our Constitution and where is its protection and security? What becomes of its limitations and guaranties when its terms are finally distorted and perverted by a Federal judiciary? Conceive of our Federal judges in disrepute, maligned, and no longer enjoying the confidence of the people.

When that time comes another time will shortly follow when those Federal judges will be deposed. They will be followed by other judges, who in all probability will go to the other extreme from that which occasioned the downfall of their predecesors. A new judgeship warranted in disregarding the decisions of the old, under the power of judicial interpretation, can make the Constitution mean another thing, pervert its powers, and sweep away its safeguards, limitations, and bill of rights.

To the extent that this bill, even in a small degree, tends to subject judges to such criticism and disrespect, it contributes toward that final calamity.

What will these judges do when they meet? In making a survey they will perform a legislative function that belongs to a committee of Congress and not to a judicial body.

They are required to "submit recommendations as to the needs." They are charged with the duties of advising as to "improvement or expedition of the administration of justice."

We know about what that will mean. It will mean eventually that our Federal judiciary in conference assembled will become the propaganda organization for legislation for the benefit of the Federal judiciary. As section 1 gives judges and the Attorney General the right to create a Federal judgeship, section 2 will give official color to the judicial recommendations to Congress to create more judgeships and seek other advantages for the Federal judiciary.

The report of this committee now before us gives warning of what kind of recommendations the Federal judges will make. The report on page 4 shows that the Attorney General created a voluntary commission consisting of three Federal judges and two Federal attorneys to "look into the question of relieving the United States district courts of the congestion."

The report of this voluntary committee is annexed to the report of the Judiciary Committee. That committee suggested nothing to improve or expedite the work of any Federal judge in this country. They recommended that 18 district judges at large be appointed to meet the present emergency as to congestion. They also stated that additional permanent judges should be provided where it was apparent that congestion was to be permanent. They made no recommendation for eliminating incapacitated or antiquated judges. They made no recommendation for speeding up work by judges who are indifferent or lax in their methods. They recommended only the creation of more judgeships.

If this conference is created it will be recommending more judgeships as long as the Republic lasts. Their recommendations, where frequently their own interests are involved, will be presented here as recommendations having the weight of official character. For the sake of the good name of our Federal judiciary we can not afford to put it in a position of such self-seeking. In questions where the betterment of the situation of these judges or the relief of themselves from work is involved they are not in position to give Congress advice that might be controlling. They should not be placed in that assailable situation in the eyes of the people of the country. Neither would such a conference be in a position to reject the persistent demands of various fellow judges from over the country without embarrassment.

In my judgment section 2 should be eliminated from this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to close debate in three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon what?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Upon the section and amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] moves that all debate on the section and all amendments thereto close in three minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to retain this provision. This is one of the provisions that the Chief Justice is very much interested in, and so is the Attorney General and the commission that was appointed by the Attorney General for the purpose of trying to see if we could not get some system into our judicial machinery.

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman tell us the number of judges that it is contemplated will attend the conference?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Nine.

Now, it is the object of this to try to keep these judges working to the best advantage and make all of the judges function. In some sections they do but little work, while other judges work very hard. I believe if the judges can meet together and plan the work to be done and judges can be assigned to do it, we will get the judges to feel the responsibility for performing the judicial work of the country. I hope this House will leave this provision in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That section 13 of the Judicial Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 13. That when any district judge is prevented by reason of any disability from holding any stated or appointed term of his court, and a certificate to that effect is submitted under the seal of the court by the clerk thereof to any circuit judge of the judicial circuit in which said district is located, or in cases of the absence of all the said circuit judges, to the circuit justice of said judicial circuit, such circuit judge or circuit justice may, if in his judgment the public interests require, designate, assign, and appoint any district judge of any district court within the same judicial circuit to hold said court for the whole or a part of said term, and to discharge all the judicial duties of the judge so prevented by illness or disability, during the period of such disability and for such further time as the business of such court and the circuit may seem to require.

"Whenever it is found impracticable to designate, assign, and appoint another district judge within the same circuit to discharge the duties of a district judge prevented by reason of any disability from holding a term of his court as aforesaid, and a certificate to that effect under the seal of the court is presented by a circuit judge or the circuit justice to the Chief Justice of the United States he may, if in his opinion the public interests so require, designate, assign, and appoint a district judge of an adjoining judicial circuit, if practicable, if not, of any judicial circuit, to hold said court for the whole or a part of said term and to discharge all the judicial duties of said judge so prevented and for such further time as the business of the courts of such districts and circuits may seem to require.

"Designations, assignments, and appointments made hereunder shall be filed in the office of the clerks and entered on the minutes of both the court from and to which the judge is designated, assigned, and appointed, and a certified copy of such designation, assignment, and appointment under the seal of the court of the justice or judge making same, shall be delivered to the judge thus designated, assigned and appointed."

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this is a part of the machinery in this section that provides for the transfer of judges from places where they may not be, for the time, needed, to other places where they are needed. I expect to support this bill, and yet I do not want to support it without stating to the members of the committee that, in my judgment, it is very imperfect in many respects. It provides for the appointment of a number of district judges, and yet many places that need such additional help are not provided with it. For instance, in the particular district in which I live, the southern district of Illinois, embracing several large cities, the largest cities in the State outside of the city of Chicago, no additional judge is provided, and yet the accumulation of business there is 1,500 cases, while other districts that are provided with additional judges do not have half that number. I take it from what the Attorney General has said, and I believe it is true, that additional judges over and above the number required in this bill will hereafter be urged, and I desire to say now, on my own behalf and for those who live in my part of the State of Illinois, that the business in our district is so congested that unless some relief is given us by transfer of judges from other places we can not possibly catch up with the business in that district in Illinois.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Does not the gentleman think a provision which will permit the systematizing and the synchronizing of the work throughout the United States will obviate the difficulty of which he speaks?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I think it will help. I think it is one of the valuable provisions of the bill. I can see no harm in it. If there ever was a time in the history of the country when we needed judges, courts, and something done, it is now. The national prohibition law is being openly flouted. The condition in this country is becoming such as to bring the blush of shame to anyone who will acknowledge the truth about the situation. The law is being openly flouted everywhere; I do not know whether it is because of the lack of judges, or whether it is because the law that we have is not enforced; but so far as I am concerned, unless this law is to be a farce, we ought to authorize all the necessary machinery to enforce the law, and if then it can not be enforced we should do something else.

I have stood here and voted consistently every time for national prohibition. I have always voted that way. I believe in it. But, gentlemen of the committee, I believe in my heart that there could be nothing worse for us than the conditions that exist in this country to-day, where the law is being brought into open contempt and disrepute by lawbreaking everywhere. I want to see additional judges appointed on the bench of the United States who will not only be good lawyers but who will inject some fear of God into the breasts of lawbreakers in this country. I hope they will do it. The time has come for us to quit fooling with these people who break the law, and either enforce the law as it should be enforced or else back up and change the law. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COCKRAN: Page 6, line 11, after the word "require," insert: "Every judge shall devote his time to the duties of his office, and he shall not engage in any private employment for which he receives compensation."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, you will observe that this is different from the amendment just ruled out of order and is distinctly germane to the provisions of this section.

This section makes provision for cases where judges are disabled and do not perform the full duties of their office. This is a provision to the effect that this disability and failure to perform the duties of his office shall not arise from his taking other occupations for which he receives compensation. That is entirely distinct from the other, which declared a certain act to be a high misdemeanor. This simply takes measures to prevent the condition from becoming too numerous—the condition with which the section seeks to deal.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COCKRAN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman said that his amendment relates generally to judges, or only to the judges who are assigned?

Mr. COCKRAN. It relates to all judges, because these judges become a part of the general judicial establishment, and the prohibition applies to all of them, to prevent an increase of the condition which renders these new appointments necessary.

Mr. MANN. I think that is what the gentleman's amendment would do.

Mr. COCKRAN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. It would apply to all the judges, as the gentleman states. This provision, however, applies only to the judges when they are assigned, while they are assigned to hold court in another district. Therefore the gentleman's amendment is not germane to that provision.

Mr. COCKRAN. But this section has to deal with the transfer of all judges. The section which it seeks to amend deals with the transfer of all judges and the conditions under which the transfer becomes necessary. The object of this amendment is to reduce, so far as possible, the conditions under which the assignment shall become advisable.

Mr. MANN. This section applies to the assignment of judges from one district to another district, and then provides that the judge so assigned shall, when he is so assigned, discharge the duties of the judge to whose district he is assigned. That is all the section does. The gentleman proposes an amendment defining the duties of all judges, whether they are assigned or not. Plainly that provision is not germane to the amendment providing that a judge who is assigned shall perform the duties of the judge in whose district he is assigned.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] offers an amendment to the proposed amendment of section 13 of the Judicial Code, as follows:

> Every judge shall devote his time to the duties of his office, and shall not engage in any private employment for which he receives compensation.

The original section 13 of the Judicial Code and the proposed amendment as carried in the bill are limited, and their subject matter is confined to the designation of judges. There is no provision in the original section nor in the section under consideration referring to the duties, qualifications, and time that the judge shall devote to the performance of his duties. It is a matter not connected with the subject matter of the section under consideration. The subject matter of the section under consideration is the designation and assignment of judges in the performance of the duties of such judges. Therefore the amendment is not germane, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk will read.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina moves to strike out section 3.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, this is merely a provision which is an entering wedge to having what once was called a lot of "carpetbag judges" transported from one section of the country to another. I have no harsh words to speak about that class of judges, but the Federal courts administer law which is written in the States. In matter of property, in all important matters, the proceedings are according to the law of the State where the court is conducted. Now, you propose to fix it here so as to take judges, say, from Louisiana, where the civil law applies, over into Alabama, where the common law applies, and put them to work to hold court and try all sorts of cases. You propose to take men from Maryland or Virginia or Pennsylvania and send them down to South Carolina, where the practice is different, where many of the rules of property are different, where the decisions are entirely unfamiliar to the transferred judge. You transport him down there and put him on the bench to try the cases that are to be tried in that jurisdiction.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Do not the Supreme Court and the circuit court of appeals have to deal with just those conflicts to which the gentleman refers?

Mr. STEVENSON. The Supreme Court and the circuit courts do have that to do, but they do not have anything else to do, and the questions come up there and they have the opportunity to master those questions as they are presented much better than a man does who is simply a district judge, and who is familiar with the practice in one district, and then is transferred somewhere else, where he does not know anything about the practice, the bar, or the rules of property, or the controlling decisions.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Does not the gentleman believe that the provision for an annual conference, by which these judges can get together and discuss these matters, will result in sending judges who are properly qualified to the States in which they are to sit?

Mr. STEVENSON. These conferences are held by one circuit judge from each circuit. That judge himself may be entirely unfamiliar with the legal terminology of States and districts that are within his own circuit.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I realize that this is probably the heart of this bill. I do not care if we break the heart of the bill. I do not like it anyhow. In the first place, you are adding an enormous expense here without necessity, according to my judgment. In the next place, we of my State, at least, have had enough of the transportation of judges from a distance down there to make decisions that are revolutionary and which will overturn the decisions with reference to the rights of property and the rulings of the courts. We have had enough of that to do us for a century at least. We used to have a satrap from Baltimore who went down there and put many of our people in jail, and they had to be delivered from jail by the Supreme Court of the United States, and some of them had to suffer until they were delivered by the pardon of President Grant, although the statute under which they were put in jail was subsequently practically declared to be null and void and without authority of the Constitution. Therefore I am slow to agree to anything which proposes to give anybody the right to violate in principle that section of the Constitution which says that a man who is to be tried has a right to be tried by a jury and a court who are familiar with the surroundings from which he comes and with the conditions under which he labors. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, just a word. We practically have this provision in the present law. All this does is to permit the judges from one circuit to be sent across the line so they can try cases in an adjoining circuit. In many instances that will be a great advantage.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is not that permissible now when it is requested?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No; it is not. This will allow them to go wherever they are sent, and it seems to me that the line between the circuits should not bar the assignment of judges from one circuit to another.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. In view of the different procedure that applies in the different States, does not the gentleman think that this should be limited to judges within the same State? In other words, strike out, in lines 6 and 7, the words "judicial circuit" and insert the word "State," so that they might be transferred anywhere in the same State.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No. The present law allows them to be assigned inside their own circuit.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I understand they could still be assigned as under the present law; that it would not keep the present law from applying where they consented to it.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. A good many of these judges do not want to be assigned to other districts, but we feel that when they are drawing their salaries as judges they ought to serve the public, and that the power should exist to send them wherever they can perform service; and with this annual conference it seems to me they will be able to determine where a particular judge can do the best work, and he ought to be assigned there, irrespective of any circuit boundary line. I do not imagine there will be any trouble on that account. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES of Texas. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman that they ought to be assigned wherever they consent to it, but it does seem to me that a judge should not be compelled to go to some place outside his own State where he may not be familiar with the procedure. When he is sent outside of his own State, it ought to be with his consent.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It is the understanding of the committee that very often when judges are assigned they want to go to some distant State.

Mr. JONES of Texas. That could be taken care of under the existing law.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. LAYTON. Is it possible under this bill for the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States to take any of the circuit judges and transfer them at his will and pleasure from one circuit to another?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I think this relates more particularly to the district judges. I do not think there is any provision of that kind in the bill.

Mr. LAYTON. He would not have that power?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not think so.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] to strike out section 3.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That section 14 of the Judicial Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 14. That whenever by reason of the accumulation or arrears of business, or in case of any special or urgent business, in any district court in the judgment of the senior circuit judge or, in his absence, the circuit justice of the judicial circuit in which said district is located, there is need for additional judges in order to expedite the business of said court, such senior circuit judge or circuit justice may, and on request of the district judge of the district court where such accumulation, arrears, or urgency exists, shall designate, assign, and appoint any other district judge or judges within the said judicial circuit to hold a district court for a stated or appointed term or for a special term, in order to relieve such accumulation, arrears, or urgency, and such judge or judges when so designated, assigned, and appointed shall have the same powers and exercise the same jurisdiction and discharge the same judicial duties as the judge appointed for the district court to which such designation, assignment, or appointment is made. The same certification shall be made hereunder as is provided in the preceding section."

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee: Page 8, line 3, after the word "made," strike out the period and insert a semicolon and the words: "Provided, That no district judge shall be thus relieved, unless it appears that he has actually held court at least 1,000 hours during the preceding year, provided such district judge has been physically able to render such service during said period."

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, some seem to think that this is a laughing matter, but it is not near as much a joke as is the disgraceful manner in which some of the Federal judges pretend to perform their duties. This does not require the judge to do his duty, it does not require him to work, but it does provide that unless he renders this reasonable service the people of the United States shall not pay the salary of another judge to do the work that he should do. Awhile ago the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] suggested that it was undignified to hold a stop watch on the judges. Some of them ought to have a stop watch held on them, but this does not do it. In order to ascertain the amount of time he has held court, all that is necessary is for the clerk to tabulate the hours from the minutes of the court, a very simple process. This amendment only involves holding court for 5 hours per day for 5 days per week for 40 weeks per year, which leaves 12 entire weeks vacation, and it also leaves 2 days' vacation each of the other weeks, and then only requires him to hold court for 5 hours daily during the days when he is holding court. While we have many faithful, honest, conscientious judges—we have two of them in my State—yet the necessity for this bill in many particulars grows out of the absolutely dishonest failure of many Federal judges to perform their duty, and I do not think it is nearly so undignified for a Federal judge to make a single report upon the labor that he has performed as it is for him to dishonestly and flagrantly refuse to perform his duties and then expect the Government to furnish him another man to do it for him.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does the gentleman's amendment make any provision for ascertaining the time spent in chambers?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. No; but assuming that a judge ought to work eight hours per day, and he should, if necessary, that would leave at least three hours each day, and if necessary two days additional each week when he could perform his duties in chambers, and very few, if any, of them spend half of that time in the performance of that labor.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Further in this connection, as I say, this does not require him to work this much at all, but it does provide that he is not entitled to this relief unless he renders this modicum of labor named in my proposed amendment.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I observe the gentleman said that this leaves him two days per week without occupation or employment. Does that include Sunday?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes; that, of course, would, technically speaking, include Sunday, but that is begging the question. One of the things that has brought the Federal judiciary into disrepute more than anything else is the knowledge on the part of the public that the judges frequently permit their dockets to be clogged by working only two or three or four hours per day, and it is not only a question that involves the time and salary of a Federal judge but of the large attendance of jurors and litigants and witnesses, many of whom are there on the pay of the Government. I say that this is a serious matter, and this amendment should prevail in the interest of honesty and economy. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the Chief Justice of the United States, whenever it shall be certified to him by the senior circuit judge of any judicial circuit, or by the circuit justice thereof, that it is not practicable to designate, assign, and appoint a sufficient number of district judges of other districts within said judicial circuit, including any territory assigned to said circuit, to expedite the business or relieve the accumulation or urgency of business in any district court, may, if in his judgment the public interests so require, designate, assign, and appoint any judge of any district court in any other judicial circuit to hold a district court within the circuit where said accumulation or urgency exists, and to have and exercise all the powers that are vested in the judge thereof. Such certification, designation, assignment, and appointment shall be made as provided in section 3 hereof.

Each of said district judges may, in the case of designation, assignment, and appointment under the provisions of this act, hold separately at the same time a district court in such district or territory and discharge all the judicial duties of said district or territorial judge therein.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 8, line 19, strike out the figure "3" and the word "hereof" and insert in lieu thereof the figures and words "13 of the Judicial Code."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, section 3 of this bill amends section 13 of the Judicial Code, and this change is made to correspond with that.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Is the gentleman quite sure that the term "Judicial Code" technically applies to the statute that treats judiciary?

Mr. WALSH. It does. The act passed in March, 1912, or on March 3, 1911, I have forgotten the date, specifically provides that it may be known and cited as the Judicial Code.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That section 18 of the Judicial Code is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 18. That the Chief Justice of the United States, or the circuit justice of any judicial circuit, or the senior circuit judge thereof, may, if the public interests so require, designate, assign, and appoint any circuit judge of a judicial circuit to hold a district court within said circuit."

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have listened with attention to the entire debate on this bill, and while the discussion has covered a wide field, it seems to me that the issue can be summed up by asking this question: Will Congress grant the measure of relief here proposed to remedy a condition of congestion of business before the Federal courts the existence of which everyone admits? Most of the Members of the House are lawyers, and I freely concede that they are better qualified to argue about court procedure than a mere layman like myself, but sometimes I fear that the very familiarity of attorneys with legal delays may cause them to forget the feelings of their clients whose business affairs are paralyzed and whose hearts are sick waiting for judicial decisions long deferred. In the punishment of crime the need for prompt action is even greater, for will anyone deny that the administration of justice becomes a mockery when none are tried except those who are so poor and friendless that they can not give bail. Punishment must not only be certain but swift if there is to be respect for the law. Let us therefore pass this bill, so that we can truthfully say to those who sent us here that Congress is no longer a party to the intolerable procrastination that plagues those who seek a legal remedy for the wrongs from which they suffer and that the lapse of time will not continue to be a safe shield for criminals.

Complaint is made that the House has not been furnished with complete and detailed information as to the necessity for the appointment of each and every one of the 22 additional judges provided for in this bill. My reply is that no mistake was made in recommending another judge for the district of Arizona, and it is only fair to presume that the same care and consideration was exercised in reaching a like conclusion in the 21 other instances. Nor is any useful purpose served by seeking some fixed and inflexible rule to determine whether an extra judge is needed. Why talk of population or the number of cases pending when the demonstrated fact remains that there is more work than any one judge, however industrious or however able, can do?

One who would take population as his sole guide said to me that he could see no reason for two judges in Arizona, where only 333,000 people reside, while 2,930,000 are served by one Federal judge in Indiana. The answer is that there are over 42,000 Indians in Arizona, while all the red men were long since driven from the State to which they gave its name. Every Indian is a ward of the Government, and therefore is entitled to the protection of the Federal courts. There are over 18,000,000 acres in Indian reservations in Arizona and, in addition, over 13,000,000 acres are also under Federal control as national forests. Citizens can only go upon these forests by permission, not by right, and trespass cases are tried at every term of the Federal court. Indiana contains no forest reserves. Originally there were 22,000,000 acres of public land within her borders, but it has long since passed into private ownership. The public domain almost equals that amount in Arizona to-day, and its proper protection must be safeguarded by the Federal court. The reclamation law does not apply to Indiana, yet under its terms over $19,000,000 of Federal funds have been invested in irrigation projects in Arizona, and the Federal court has, after extended litigation, directed the collection of millions of dollars payable to the United States by the water users.

It is remotely possible that dutiable goods might be smuggled into Indiana from Canada, but the Federal court in Arizona must frequently try and punish violators of the customs laws who seek to take advantage of the inadequately patrolled Mexican border. The proximity of Mexico is likewise the cause for many violations of the immigration laws, particularly the Chinese exclusion act. The court must also enforce the prohibition against the export of arms into Mexico, which is still in effect. These are all instances of special and peculiar Federal interests and activities which add to the duties of a judge of the United States court in Arizona that are unknown in Indiana, even though the population be eight times as great. In addition thereto the court in Arizona has been forced to consider its due proportion of cases arising from the enactment of the pure food and drugs act, the antinarcotic law, the prohibition amendment, the railway safety appliance act, the hours of service act, and various other laws enacted by Congress in recent years.

As another illustration of the difference in the conditions prevailing in Arizona let me refer to the recently issued annual report of the Attorney General, which shows that $50,876 was expended in Arizona during the last fiscal year for the support of prisoners of the United States court while but $10,054 was spent for that purpose in Indiana. The sum so expended in Arizona is greater than in any other State in the Union, and the reason for it is that large numbers of prisoners must be held in jail for months awaiting trial. There can be no question but that much more than the salary of the additional Federal judge and all of the other additional expenses incident to his appointment will be saved each year by the prompt trial of criminal cases.

Another extraordinary condition which adds to the difficulties of the Federal judge in the State that I have the honor to represent is its great area. Arizona is the fifth State in size in the Union, being exceeded only by Texas, California, Montana, and New Mexico. It is larger than all of New England, and if Rhode Island is excluded from that group of States and New York added, the combined area is only a few square miles larger than Arizona. The 113,956 square miles in my State are greater than the combined area of New Jersey, Delaware, Pennsylvania, and Maryland, and almost as great as that of Ohio, Indiana, and Kentucky. From the Colorado River one can follow the international monuments eastward on her southern boundary for 350 miles to the New Mexico line. From Douglas on the Mexican border to Fredonia near the Utah line is 400 miles in a direct route, but no one could travel that way except in an airship, because the San Francisco Peaks two and a half miles high and the Grand Canyon a mile deep are in the way.

It is difficult for Members from the Eastern States to realize the distances that must be traveled between the places where sessions of the Federal court are required by law to be held twice each year in Arizona. From Prescott to Phoenix is 137 miles and from Phoenix to Tucson is 122 miles. In each case the judge must travel farther than from Washington to Richmond, or about as far as from Washington to Philadelphia. From Tucson to Globe is 238 miles, which is the same railroad mileage as from Washington to New York City. The total distance from Globe to Prescott by rail is 497 miles, which is farther than from Washington to Columbus, Ohio, or to Columbia, S. C., or to Boston, Mass.

There is another explanation for the congested condition of the Federal court calendar in Arizona, which arises from the fact that prior to statehood, under the Territorial laws, companies could be incorporated more promptly and at less expense than anywhere else. Thousands of such corporations were organized to do business in other States, and when they get into difficulties elsewhere suits are brought against them in the Arizona Federal court. A recent case of this character was the Coca-Cola Co. v. the Koke Co., which took months of the court's time before a decision was rendered.

A further cause for litigation is the transfer of cases from the State courts to the Federal court owing to the fact that practically all of our large copper-mining companies are foreign corporations. The employers' liability and workmen's compensation law of Arizona defines mining as an extra-hazardous occupation and is unique in that a workman has three different remedies that he may pursue in case of injury. Arizona produces more copper than any other State in the Union, and large numbers of miners are employed, with the natural consequence that transferred suits of this character, many of which are stubbornly contested, occupy much of the time of the Federal judge.

Having demonstrated the exceptional nature and character of the cases that he must decide, it is proper that I should speak of the ability and industry of the judge. The present incumbent was appointed nine years ago in the prime of life. Under his oath he has conscientiously administered justice to the rich and poor without fear or favor. He has held two terms of court in four places in the State each year, and has worked day and night until his health is beginning to break under the strain of attempting to dispose of the ever-increasing business of his court. He has had no real vacation since his appointment, because he has felt it proper to assist the Federal judges in California each summer in return for the many occasions on which he has called upon them to come to Arizona to assist him. He holds court from 9 in the morning to 5 o'clock in the afternoon during jury trials and from 10 to 4 and 5 o'clock for law cases, yet, despite his every effort, and with the assistance of other judges, the situation grows worse each year. The appointment of an additional judge is the only possible way of relief.

In conclusion let me say that I am heartily pleased that the Committee on the Judiciary had the courage to utterly reject the proposed plan for the appointment of 18 district judges with roving commissions. I suspect that the whole scheme was born of a desire to avoid conflicts with Members of the body at the other end of the Capitol, who, since they have the right to confirm nominations made by the President, might seek to dictate the appointment of judges in their States. I know that it was first suggested by those who have experienced that very difficulty. There are numerous exceptions, but it is unfortunately true that there are some Federal judges who, through the long-continued exercise of power, have become inconsiderate and arbitrary. Almost the only restraining influence upon them is that, by reason of their selection from the bar of the State in which they continue to reside, old friends can address them with frankness respecting their official conduct. Judges with no fixed assignment would be without even this slight check upon their actions on the bench, with the result that they would soon be looked upon as judicial despots whose coming was to be dreaded. The entire proposal was wrong in its conception and it is well that it has been definitely abandoned. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That whenever it shall be certified to the Chief Justice of the United States by the chief justice of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia or in his absence by an associate justice of said court of appeals, that on account of the accumulation or urgency of business in said district it is impracticable for the judges of the supreme court of said district to relieve such accumulation or urgency of business the Chief Justice of the United States may, if in his judgment the public interests so require, designate, and appoint the judge of any district court in any circuit to sit in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia and to have and to exercise within said district to which he is so assigned the same powers as are vested in a supreme judge thereof.

The certification, designation, assignment, and appointment hereunder shall conform so far as possible to the provisions of section 3 of this act.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the same amendment in line 23, page 9, to strike out the figure "3" and the words "of this act" and insert the figures "13" and the words "the Judicial Code."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WALSH: Page 9, line 23, strike out "3 of this act" and insert in lieu thereof "13 of the Judicial Code."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment from the Judiciary Committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. VOLSTEAD: Page 9, after the end of line 20, insert as a separate paragraph the following:

"The judges of the United States Court of Customs Appeals, or any of them, whenever the business of that court will permit, may, if in the judgment of the Chief Justice of the United States the public interest so requires, be designated and assigned by said Chief Justice for service, from time to time and until he shall otherwise direct, in the district court of any district or the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia or the court of appeals of said District, when so requested by the judge thereof, or in courts with more than one judge when requested by the senior judge or chief justice thereof, and the judge so assigned shall exercise and is hereby vested with all powers, jurisdiction, rights, and duties conferred by law upon the judge of the court to which he may be assigned."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment. It is neither germane to the bill nor the section to which it is offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas makes a point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill or germane to the section to which it is offered. The Chair sustains the point of order so far as that it is not germane to the section to which it is offered, but will reserve his ruling as to whether it will be germane as a separate section. Does the gentleman from Minnesota desire to offer it as a new section?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment that I send to the Clerk's desk as a separate section, to be known as section 8.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. VOLSTEAD: Page 9, after line 23, insert a new section as follows:

"The judges of the United States Court of Customs Appeals, or any of them, whenever the business of that court will permit, may, if in the judgment of the Chief Justice of the United States the public interest so requires, be designated and assigned by said Chief Justice for service, from time to time and until he shall otherwise direct, in the district court of any district or the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia or the court of appeals of said District, when so requested by the judge thereof, or in courts with more than one judge when requested by the senior judge or chief justice thereof, and the judge so assigned shall exercise and is hereby vested with all powers, jurisdiction, rights, and duties conferred by law upon the judge of the court to which he may be assigned."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill. The bill, I understand, and as I take it, is a bill providing for the appointment of additional district judges, for their assignment, and for increase in their maintenance allowance. As I grasp the gentleman's amendment it covers the question of assignment of members of the Court of Customs Appeals, who are authorized when assigned to hold court for any of the regularly appointed district judges of the United States or for the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. That is not germane to the purpose of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to think that the amendment is germane to the provisions of the bill. The same matter is not involved that was involved in points of order that were made heretofore. Here is a bill that relates to the assignment of judges of different courts, including the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. Now, it is true that the judges of the customs court are not mentioned in the bill, but this bill generally refers to the assignment of Federal judges in the United States in various districts, from one district to another. There are three or four or five separate sections relating to that subject in the bill. It seems to me perfectly competent to add additional judges who may be assigned from one district to another. It seems to me it is a germane proposition to assign other Federal judges from one district to another.

Mr. WINGO. I may be in error as to what the bill contains, although I have read it several times. The bill only covers district judges.

Mr. MANN. District judges and circuit judges.

Mr. WINGO. But nowhere in the bill is there any provision covering the appointment of additional judges of the Court of Customs Appeals or for the discharge of any duty or in any way affecting their employment or emolument.

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly not.

Mr. WINGO. So if there is nothing in there covering those particular judges as a separate class—and it deals with other judges—it would not be germane to the bill.

Mr. MANN. It would not be germane to define new duties for the judges of the customs court, but here is a bill mainly related, in most of its sections at least, to the assignment of Federal judges to various district courts, including the courts of the District of Columbia. I should think it is wholly competent in connection with that to provide additional judges who may be assigned to the same place already provided in the bill for other classes of judges.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill under consideration, so far as the assignment of judges is concerned, provides not only for assignment of district judges, but, in section 6, for the assignment of circuit judges to relieve the congested conditions in various district courts.

If the bill under consideration were restricted merely to the appointment of district judges, it might be argued that, as it applied only to one class, it would not be in order to provide for the designation of another class. But as there are two classes of judges that may be designated to district courts, it comes within that familiar rule where, when a bill provides for more than one class, a third class may be added. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this amendment, if adopted, would inject an element into this bill which, however much it may have been considered by the Committee on the Judiciary of the House, has not been considered by the House fully. In my opinion, if this amendment be adopted, it will provoke an opposition to the bill, as reported by the committee and which has been considered by the Members in their private study, that does not now exist.

I think the question of assigning the customs court judges who were appointed, after all, for a particular purpose—that is, with particular duties confronting them—is a thing that ought to be considered separate and independent of this measure as reported originally from the committee. I very much hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the Volstead amendment.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I think this amendment should not prevail. The gentlemen who are now on the Customs Court of Appeals may be very able lawyers. Personally, I do not know as to that, but I do know this, that they need not be necessarily very great lawyers to serve well in that court. They have but two classes of cases to pass upon. One class is that of cases of reappraisement of the valuation of merchandise imported into the United States. The other is the classification of that merchandise. They deal almost exclusively with questions of fact and very little with questions of law. They may have been able men and able lawyers when they went on the bench, but they have been out of touch with the practice of the law for many years, and I am very sure that in my own State and in my own district we would not want one of these men assigned to come there and try these vastly important cases—admiralty cases and patent law cases—when they have not been in touch with the practice of the law for years.

Why, by this amendment we are practically creating a number of district judges. We should not create them in that way. These men were not appointed because they were well qualified to be district judges. They were appointed because they were well qualified to pass upon questions arising under the tariff law. I do not think we would aid the administration of justice by enacting an amendment of this kind. I do not think we would facilitate the transaction of our important business. I think it would be a bad precedent, an unwise thing to do. I think it would lower the standard of judicial service and accomplishment, and I feel that the amendment should be defeated.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the Volstead amendment.

Mr. VOLSTEAD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am surprised at the statements that have been made by different gentlemen. These judges are very high-class lawyers. They receive $8,000 in annual salary, a salary that is higher than that paid district judges. I have made considerable inquiry in reference to them. They stand very high as lawyers and there is not any reason on earth why they should not be put to work.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. What is the information of the gentleman as to the number of men on the Court of Customs Appeals who would be available for this work?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. There is one vacancy on that bench now, but there are five judges under the statute. It seems to me ridiculous for Members to insist that they are unfit to try such cases as they may be called upon to try. We hope to put them to work in the supreme court of this District, where they have been clamoring for two additional judges. There is no reason why they should not serve and thus save $7,500 for each of two judges.

These judges have very little to do and they asked me during the last Congress to introduce a bill, and I introduced one practically the same as the amendment which I have offered. It was passed in this House, but failed in the Senate.

Mr. MILLER. You will be having some judges drawing $8,000 and some drawing $7,500?

Mr. MCARTHUR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. MCARTHUR. Is there not enough work for these customs court judges to do now?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No.

Mr. MCARTHUR. Then why not abolish the court?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. When we get a new tariff law those judges will have work for some time, until they get the law settled. They do not pass upon questions of fact, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED] has just told you. That is done by the board of appraisers, or whatever they are called, and these men are appointed to pass upon the law questions; that is what they are for. Whenever those questions are settled they may have but very little work to do, and then may be assigned to other work if this amendment is adopted.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. As I understand the gentleman, while these judges have not had anything to do for some time past, yet they are certain to have something to do in the future, and we are legislating for the future and not for the past?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. We provide that they shall serve when they are available.

Mr. DEMPSEY. They will not be available, with a new tariff law just coming in force, for a considerable time. We are not talking and legislating for the past. We are legislating for the future.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. But just as soon as the tariff law has been passed the various questions will be presented and adjudicated just as they were before, when we passed the last tariff law.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. About what time does the gentleman think that will begin? [Laughter.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That is another question. It may be five or six months before that time comes. There is no reason why they should not go to work here in the District and help to clean up this calendar that is almost three years behind. Here we have five judges of this Customs Court with practically no work, men whom we have got to pay, men who are abundantly able to do that work, and are willing to do it. It seems utterly ridiculous that Congress should refuse to set those men at work.

Mr. MILLER. Why do you not confine it to Washington?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division, and pending that I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one-half minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for one-half minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think the gentleman from Minnesota perhaps did not understand that the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] has an amendment that he desires to offer, an amendment to the amendment, upon which he would like to have five minutes.

Mr. WALSH. There will be 10 minutes' debate.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. If the gentleman will be satisfied with four minutes there will be no trouble about it.

Mr. RAKER. I will take four minutes.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. There will be 10 minutes of debate, and that will accommodate everybody.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. A division has been asked for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 60, noes 2.

Accordingly the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. How is the 10 minutes' time to be divided?

The CHAIRMAN. No arrangement was made as to the disposition of the time.

Mr. WINGO. I understand the gentleman from California is willing to take four minutes.

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. CURRY. I want one minute.

Mr. WINGO. And I understand I am to have the remaining five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. That is entirely agreeable to the Chair. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAKER: Add to the Volstead amendment inserted as a new section 8, the following:

"The certification, designation, assignment, and appointment hereunder shall conform, so far as possible, to the provisions of section 13 of the Judicial Code."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The committee accepts that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota accepts the amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California desire to discuss his amendment?

Mr. RAKER. I should like to be heard.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I make the point of order that under the rules a proposed amendment can not be accepted. It must be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order made by the gentleman from Alabama is well taken. The Chair did not intend to have the amendment adopted merely upon the ipse dixit of the gentleman from Minnesota. The gentleman from California is recognized.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I did not rise to discuss the amendment I offered to the Volstead amendment and shall not discuss it. It is in the same language as the other sections, and is necessary. It is wholly immaterial to me what the House does with it. But what I do rise to say is this: The Chief Justice of the United States Court of Customs Appeals, Judge De Vries, was a former and able Member of this House, where he had a high standing.

He has a high standing as a member of the bar of California. None better. Another member, Judge Smith, was Governor General of the Philippines, and for years stood at the head of the bar of San Francisco as a lawyer. The other two men on the bench of that court, one of them from Vermont, Judge Barber, and the other from Ohio, Judge Martin, and each of them stood at the head of the profession in the State from which he came. The statement that only two questions are involved before this court is a mistaken statement. Read the reports of the decisions of that court, nine volumes now published and one partly published, and you will find that all the questions of evidence in civil and equity cases are involved in those decisions. All these men are the peers of any of the judges of the district courts of the United States as men, in ability, and as civil and equity lawyers, all men of wide experience, able lawyers, and able and worthy judges, and they would be a credit to the district bench wherever they might be sent to preside, and they can give the very best service. I am for this amendment and hope it will be adopted.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, I have the honor of the personal acquaintance and friendship of three of the members of the Court of Customs Appeals. There are no abler lawyers in the United States of America than those three men. They would grace the Supreme Bench of the United States. I had the honor to succeed one of these gentlemen as a Member of this House. There is no question as to their ability, there is no question that they could perform the duties of United States district judges as well as anyone who might be selected. The only question to be considered by the committee is as to whether the duties of the Court of Customs Appeals will permit of their devoting their time to other work after the tariff bill shall have been enacted. I can not sit quiet and hear their ability attacked without stating that from my personal knowledge there are no better lawyers in the United States than these three men, and none better qualified to perform the duties of district judges should this amendment be adopted and any of them should be assigned to hear and decide any case that may come before such court.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I think it is unfortunate that from the statement which has been made both of the gentlemen from California who have preceded me should have the impression that anything was said in disparagement of the character or legal ability of the members of the Court of Customs Appeals. But in all seriousness I want to submit to you lawyers and to you business men that it would be unwise to adopt this amendment.

While, of course, there is some doubt as to when you will pass your tariff law, of course you are going ultimately to do it, and that will cause considerable work for your Court of Customs Appeals. I care not how able these men may be as lawyers, or how high their character, their peculiar fitness in one place is not a measure of their peculiar fitness to discharge duties in another place, and it would be unfortunate for you gentlemen, more so than for me, to have a member of the Court of Customs Appeals who has been devoting his time and attention and thought for years to the peculiar and particular class of business that comes before that court taken from that court and assigned as an emergency judge to clean up dockets in a district court where the general run of cases he would be called upon to try are those heard and determined generally in the district courts of the United States. It would not be fair to this Court of Customs Appeals, it would not be fair to the litigants, it would not be fair to the attorneys. Instead of expediting the clearing of the dockets, in the nature of things it would have a tendency to slow up the action of the courts over which they presided. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. VOLSTEAD), there were—ayes 56, noes 44.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That whenever under the provisions of this act or of existing law a circuit or district judge is designated, assigned, or appointed to, or does hold, district court or transact other official business at any place other than his official place of residence, he shall, while so holding court or transacting such other official business be paid his necessary and actual expenses of travel, together with his reasonable and necessary expenses for maintenance, not to exceed $15 per day, which payments shall be made by the marshal of the district in which such court is held or other official business is transacted upon the written certificate of the judge incurring such expenses.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Strike out section 8.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. STAFFORD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9103 and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a separate vote upon the amendment assigning judges of the Court of Customs Appeals to the district courts.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? [After a pause.] If not, the question will be taken on the other amendments.

The other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the amendment on which a separate vote is demanded, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, after line 23, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"SEC. 8. The judges of the United States Court of Customs Appeals, or any of them, whenever the business of that court will permit, may, if in the judgment of the Chief Justice of the United States the public interest so requires, be designated and assigned by said Chief Justice for service, from time to time and until he shall otherwise direct, in the district court of any district of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia or the court of appeals of said District, when so requested by the judge thereof, or in courts with more than one judge when requested by the senior judge or chief justice thereof, and the judge so assigned shall exercise and is hereby vested with all powers, jurisdiction, rights, and duties conferred by law upon the judge of the court to which he may be assigned."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. VOLSTEAD) there were—ayes 63, noes 58.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. The previous question having been ordered, if the yeas and nays are ordered, and the House should adjourn, would this be the unfinished business on Monday?

The SPEAKER. It would. The gentleman from Texas demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 197, nays 90, answered "present" 1, not voting 144, as follows:

Mr. GENSMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have a general pair with the gentleman from Oklahoma, Mr. MCCLINTIC, and I wish to withdraw my vote of "yea" and answer "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. VOLSTEAD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. FAVROT, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for 10 days, on account of illness.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD remarks which I made before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in support of the bill (H. R. 8783) to prohibit the pollution of navigable streams.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD remarks made by himself before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following are the remarks referred to:

REMARKS OF HON. BENJAMIN L. ROSENBLOOM AT A HEARING BEFORE THE RIVERS AND HARBORS COMMITTEE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 7, 1921, IN SUPPORT OF H. R. 8783, A BILL TO PROHIBIT THE POLLUTION OF NAVIGABLE STREAMS.

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I listened intently to the remarks of the Secretary of Commerce, who preceded me, and was impressed with his statement that legislation to correct conditions of pollution at ports and in harbors is imperative. Although Mr. Hoover described the present condition of the waters at ports and harbors as damaging to property and destructive to fisheries and the fishing industry, I regret greatly that his investigations were not of sufficient scope to observe the conditions of navigable streams, resultant from the deposit of noxious acids. In view of his recommendation that nothing in the way of legislation be attempted until after a thorough investigation has been made of navigable inland waterways, with your indulgence I will submit comprehensive reports and studies which have already been made, and which, I believe, will convince you, gentlemen of the committee, that something must be done to correct existing conditions.

Apparently the only consideration which the Department of Commerce has given this question, according to the statement of Secretary Hoover, was from the viewpoint of the successful operation of fisheries and the preservation of fish life.

While the preservation and propagation of fish is an incidental object that we hope will be accomplished by the enactment of the bill which I introduced, it is by no means the primary consideration. While it may be the fundamental object of the Department of Commerce to secure legislation which will afford required protection to the fishing industry at ports and harbors I am actuated by many considerations in my effort to prohibit the contamination of inland waterways.

The discharge or deposit of free acid, acid waste, or any material which will become acid after being in the water is responsible for the following injury and damage:

It constitutes a constant menace and is a source of injury to the health of persons residing along the stream and using the water.

It is damaging to the steel structural parts of Government dams, resulting in hindrance to navigation.

Acid water corrodes and deteriorates plumbing in homes and buildings.
It is destructive to boiler tubes in plants located along the river and as well in steamboats operating thereon.
It annihilates all fish and kills all manner of vegetation.
It jeopardizes the health of stock on the farms.
The acid causes injury to clothing washed in the water.
The chemicals make the water dangerous to bathe in.

At some points along the Ohio River, which river has come under my personal observation, and in which I am particularly interested, the bathing beaches were deserted because of the odor from the decaying fish.

It is therefore obvious, gentlemen, that the preservation of fish life is entirely incidental, viewed from the standpoint of public importance.

In my opinion, legislation tending to overcome the present condition of navigable inland waterways is of far greater importance than the legislation which the Secretary of Commerce recommends. The water of inland rivers in many places is the only source for human consumption, and is used everywhere for domestic purposes. Ocean water is not extensively used for these purposes.

In my home city of Wheeling, W. Va., located on the banks of the Ohio River, we do not have any system of filtration, and the polluted water from the river is served to the public for every domestic use. This is true of other cities in this country. While it is true that people who can afford to have pure water delivered to them for drinking purposes do so, it is also true that many of the people in less fortunate circumstances must drink the water which is sufficiently contaminated by this acid pollution to exterminate fish life.

The United States Government is annually spending millions of dollars in constructing locks and dams and in making other improvements of navigable waterways, and the acid which is deposited in the water is destroying this work, so that Congress should do one of two things, viz, either discontinue the appropriations for improvements or protect the improvements that have been made.

The CHAIRMAN. Just a moment, Mr. ROSENBLOOM. You take the lower Mississippi; they are having a very prosperous season there in shipping. I do not think there is any pollution interfering with navigation or with the water in that part of the stream. I do not think that is true, probably, of the Ohio.

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. I will say, frankly, that this pollution does exist in the Ohio, virtually all the way from Pittsburgh to Cairo. The water is so highly charged with acids from the factories and mines along the river that it is eating out all the metal work on the dams, and Gen. Beach will tell you that it is only a question of time before all the metal superstructure will be eaten out and will have to be replaced.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what I called attention to in the present act. I think the present act does apply in a broad way to navigation. It does not apply simply to the ability to run the boats?

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. The condition of the water is such that it interferes with navigation. On the navigable streams the life of the boilers is so short that it is unprofitable to operate steamboats. The public is interested in development of steamboat transportation. The Government is interested in it to the extent of improving the waterways. Both the Government and operators of steamboats will be discouraged by the destruction of their equipment, due to this acid in the water.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you not think that the enforcement of the present law would cover that?

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. No; for the reason that while it allows the War Department to have control of the streams, there is not sufficient authority vested in the War Department to carry its orders into effect.

The principal reason for the introduction of this bill, which is always the reason for the introduction of bills in legislative assemblies, is the almost universal demand, not only from the constituents whom I have the honor to represent, but as well from people all along navigable streams everywhere. I have introduced this bill to rectify a condition which can not be remedied in any other way.

The people who live in the Ohio Valley, and who are taxpayers owning their own property, do not understand why certain individuals should be permitted to dump acids into the river which corrode and deteriorate the plumbing in their homes, causing them annoyance, inconvenience, and expense. The farmer is indeed reticent to offer water to his stock that is sufficiently contaminated to cause the destruction of all animal life which would be present in pure water. Women complain that the acid in the water has a very destructive effect on the clothes which are washed in it, and they have no other water to use except that from the river.

After a period of commercial inactivity, extending until the past summer, the Ohio River had again stocked itself with numerous fish. For the first time in many years men had an opportunity to secure an article of food of great value without cost. During the industrial depression when many families were financially crippled, many men availed themselves of the opportunity of providing a meal for their families by fishing along the banks of the river. As I have previously stated, the mere preservation of fish is only an incidental consideration for the enactment of the bill which I have introduced, yet at a time such as I have mentioned, the relief afforded by food provided as a result of catch of fish was indeed welcome to the family in dire circumstances.

The item of fish preservation is not to be ignored. Fish do not require hay, oats, or corn on which to survive, nor do they require care or attention from anyone. It consumes nothing that could otherwise be utilized by mankind, but is always available as a source of food supply. The Government annually spends a great deal of money stocking streams with fish, mainly on considerations such as I have outlined. Again I say the Congress ought either to discontinue appropriations for this purpose or adopt legislation which will protect the streams after they are stocked with fish.

Following the industrial depression some of the mills resumed operation, and after the first deposit of acid into the Ohio the surface of the water for many miles was covered with dead fish. The combination of the acid in the water and the dead fish made the water unfit for every purpose, and the odor from the decaying fish was so intense, particularly in the hot summer weather, that for a considerable period of time people living adjacent to the river were greatly annoyed.

I contend that these people are entitled to relief from similar conditions, which will continue so long as the streams are defiled. I submit, further, that no individual or group of individuals has the right to create such a nuisance against the mass of people.

I am offering for your inspection letters and petitions of protest against these conditions. I have also received many resolutions of indorsement of the bill which I have introduced from the people who are affected. I call your attention to communications which I have from New Cumberland, Wellsburg, Wheeling, New Martinsville, Marietta, Parkersburg, and Louisville, all located along the Ohio River and all complaining of the conditions which I am endeavoring to portray and asking for relief.

Mr. LAYTON. As a matter of fact, for public information, how much fish have you in the river?

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. I mentioned the fish not for the purpose of propagation but as showing the condition of the water.

Mr. LAYTON. As affecting the public health?

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. As affecting the public health. Even the manufacturers who are located along the river are compelled to treat the water chemically before they are willing to use it in their boilers.

Mr. LAYTON. I should judge from your remarks that 75 per cent of the water was pure sulphuric acid.

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. I would not say that it was quite that high. I would say it is over "one-half of 1 per cent." [Laughter.] It is an unlawful content, I am sure of that.

Speaking seriously, however, I regret that the only consideration which the Department of Commerce gave this subject was from the viewpoint of the protection of fisheries. I think I have made it clear that the problem which confronts us is of vastly superior consequence. While I realize there may be some Members of Congress who are interested primarily and entirely in prohibiting the pollution of ports and harbors, there is not a Member in Congress who is not interested in the object of the bill which I have introduced—to keep the streams in this country uncontaminated, pure, and undefiled.

The district which it is my privilege to represent is a busy hive of industry. Practically every foot of the shore line is occupied by a factory of some kind. I also have many coal mines. In justice to these manufacturers and to the operators of these coal mines it is only fair for me to state that I have not received an objection to the legislation which I proposed.

The conditions of which I speak are unusually acute in streams where the Government erected dams. These dams naturally retard the normal movement of the water, retaining sufficient in the pools to insure a certain depth or stage. This aggravates the condition.

Some of the gentlemen who have preceded me argue that water purifies itself. This was probably true at a time when the population residing along the streams and the industries located on the banks were not congregated so thickly as they are now. On the banks of the Ohio River industrial plants are so congested that the water does not have any chance to purify itself, and the flow being interfered with also adds to prevent natural purification.

This is a matter that well deserves the attention of this committee, gentlemen, as the question can only be solved by the enactment of national legislation. Sixteen separate States have already passed laws undertaking to eliminate this condition. It is evident that it would be of no avail for manufacturers and coal operators in one State to endeavor to remedy the condition when similar industries in adjacent or contiguous States were not compelled to exercise the same precaution.

Mr. LAYTON. Do I understand that in using the water of the river for commercial purposes they are estimating to do it by means of purifying the water?

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. Yes, sir; to put it in condition for use in the boilers.

Mr. LAYTON. To get rid of the acids by reason of which they can not use it in the boilers or for other purposes?

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. That is correct.

Mr. LAYTON. And your idea is that by having that process extended to this flow into the stream, polluting the stream, it would not cost very much more than the other?

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. It will not cost as much, as will be demonstrated here. From some of these other gentlemen you will hear the objections from the manufacturers and coal operators. If this legislation were to entail any great burden or interfere with or embarrass industry in any way, I would not advocate its enactment.

Mr. LAYTON. Just another question. You do not believe that all of the refuse that goes from every kind of a mill into the stream is necessarily a detriment to fish life or harmful to Government work?

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. No; that is a decision which, under the bill, will be left to the War Department.

Mr. LAYTON. Do you not think that before any legislation is enacted there should be an absolute investigatoin of the chemicals to find out just exactly which are deleterious and which are simply neutral? That would be the most scientific way.

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. We must have the law passed before any offense has been committed. It has been demonstrated that certain acids and alkalis are harmful and deleterious. The mere discharge of harmless waste matter into the streams would not be an offense which can be punished. Under this bill the offender has the right to call in and consult with the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, who is in charge of this stream. It gives him that power. While he may have the power under the present law, there is no way of compelling compliance with his advice, as there are no "teeth" in the law. The act I propose, taken along with the act regulating the harbors of this country, would undertake to place this matter in charge of those who would be able to enforce it.

Before introducing this measure I, of course, considered carefully the effect it would have on industry. I think I have previously stated that I would not conscientiously advocate any measure which would encumber the manufacturer or the coal operator. I expect to be able to show by Gen. Beach and some other gentlemen who have made an intensive study of this problem that these conditions can be corrected at an inconsequential cost. I earnestly believe that suitable legislation is imperative, and can not see where anything can be gained by deferring or delaying the matter.

We men, as I take it, are here representing those who are not of sufficient means and whose individual interests are not great enough to enable them to come here or to hire attorneys or experts or lobbyists to secure beneficial legislation. We are the paid lobbyists of the people back home, and in my district I probably have 100,000 or more of them, and none of them are here on either side of this question. If the interests represented here who object to this legislation will bear with the demonstration we have here and will listen to the statement of Gen. Beach, they will be convinced that the question must be considered, and should be considered at once.

Mr. CLOUSE. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. Yes.

Mr. CLOUSE. Under the act of March 3, 1899, which is the existing law, does not that act prohibit the discharge or deposit of any substance or material in any navigable stream or any of its tributaries that will impede or obstruct navigation? Is not that the substance and meaning of that act?

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. That is correct; yes, sir.

Mr. CLOUSE. Then the act further provides that the Secretary of War or the Chief of Engineers of the War Department may permit a deposit into any of the navigable streams of the United States or their tributaries when, under certain conditions, he may deem that it is not an impediment or an obstruction to navigation. Now, if that be the existing law, why have we not the power, and why have not the people in your district and along the Ohio River and every other navigable stream the power to do the very things that you suggest by your bill?

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. For the simple reason that there is no penalty provided.

Mr. CLOUSE. I would like to know whether or not an amendment of the existing law adding a penalty for the violation of the act would not reach the end you seek by your bill?

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. That is all this bill does. This bill simply adds a penalty, in the discretion of the Chief of Engineers, if his orders fail to be complied with.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that December 9 they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following House joint resolution:

H. J. Res. 81. Joint resolution authorizing the erection on public grounds in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, of a memorial to the dead of the First Division, American Expeditionary Forces, in the World War.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, December 12, 1921, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

411. Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the chairman of the United States Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board, transmitting report of the board for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921, was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. REED of West Virginia, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (H.
